This procedure of the board, having a tendency to benefit American shipping, will, of course, be subject to all sorts of unfair criticisms. Among those already appearing is one to the effect that there will not be sufficient American tonnage properly to care for our traffic. This claim is merely a profession of ignorance. There is nothing in the law now permitted to become active which prevents any or all of the exports and imports of this country traveling in foreign ships. If an exporter prefers to use a foreign ship, that is his privilege. If his love for the foreigner is such that he wants his imported goods delivered to him by alien craft, there is nothing in section 28 to deprive him of that pleasure. The only changed condition produced by the release of this law is that if his through shipments are handled by American vessels he gets a lower railroad rate for such goods when they are being brought from the interior to the seaboard or are being carried from the seaboard to interior points than he can get if he patronizes foreign ships. There will be just as much tonnage available with section 28 active as there is with section 28 passive, but a lower railroad rate will be available for patrons of American ships. This lower railroad rate will help fill American vessels now sailing partly empty and thus reduce ship losses without increasing ship rates.

Another claim is that this section will upset our railroad rate structure. The claim is absurd, but like so many other claims affecting American shipping it is boldly made, either because of ignorance on the part of the claimer or assumed ignorance on the part of the claimee.

Some of our ports already have export and import rates. They are ready to do business now. Therefore it is necessary merely to establish similar rates at other ports to put all the ports of this country on an equality. Such action in no way affects established rate structures, because it does not change them in the least. It merely provides for a lower rate on through shipments to and from foreign ports handled by American vessels.

This rate might be arrived at by merely providing for, say, a 10 per cent reduction from domestic rates. That simple change certainly would not affect the general rate structure, but it would give a financial reason for patronizing American vessels in our foreign trade and solve the problem without resort to "higher mathematics."

But even if important changes were involved, even if rates would need to be readjusted, this can not affect the fact that Congress has issued its mandate. That mandate can not be disregarded or defeated by any administrative department of the Government merely because it involves work.

Some of those who always are searching for obstacles to throw in the way of any attempt to aid American shipping are advising that hearings should be held before this section of the law goes into effect. There is nothing to hear. Congress enacted that this preference should be given to American ships. Now that the Shipping Board has withdrawn its suspending order the law automatically goes into effect.

It will be recalled that more than a year ago the board held public hearings in different parts of the country to satisfy itself as to transportation facilities and to give exporters and importers full opportunity to prepare for this improvement. It did not ask the people to come to it; it went to them. There is no excuse for further delay.

During the two years the board has held section 28 in suspense its operating department has cooperated in every way with foreign ships. It has entered into and faithfully respected the terms of all rate conferences. It has provided an abundance of tonnage and given all shippers every opportunity to patronize American craft on the same terms as offered by the foreigner. It has given a two-year test to that threadbare asseveration that ocean commerce is free to all and equal service will mean an equal share of the business.

As a net result of this very thorough test we find that our ships last year handled but 24 per cent of our transoceanic exports and but 17 per cent of our corresponding imports—the percentages are even lower to-day.

It is suggested by some that if Americans would show the same preference for home ships that foreigners show for theirs section 28 would not be required. With equal logic it might be said that if all the people in New York would show a due respect for law there could be a material reduction in the number of policemen employed there.

One trouble with both these propositions is that they ignore existing facts.

But the greatest fault with this proposition that we try to get along without aid for our ships is that it overlooks the main purpose of the merchant marine act of 1920. The end sought to be attained by that law is an American merchant marine privately owned, not that the Government should continue to run ships and the public keep paying their losses.

Now, it costs more to operate a ship under the American flag than it does under foreign flags. Since the statement of Mr. P. A. S. Franklin that "the Minnekada is costing us twice as much in wages under the American flag as under the British flag, and she has not a single, solitary advantage," there is less foolish denial of that fact than theretofore. But its importance is sometimes forgotten.

Section 28 is designed to help overcome this handicap. It is the same provision of law which did so much to give Germany her great merchant marine.

No nation raised the question of treaty rights while Germany was enjoying the advantages of this legislation. Germany realized its value and proceeded to use it. It will be interesting to note what attitude will be assumed now that the United States is to be the beneficiary. It will be, indeed, a remarkable incident if semi-Americans let an opportunity like this go by without raising an objecting voice.

Once more let me recall this fact: Congres has declared its aim to be a merchant marine sufficient to handle a major portion of the foreign commerce of the United States.

It has recognized that only by Government aid can such a merchant fleet be maintained.

By the act of 1920 it provided certain aids for the merchant ships of this country.

Section 28 is one of those aids. It is law, and as law should be enforced.

The Shipping Board now has done its part to have it enforced.

STATES AND SHIPPING.

[From Lloyd's List and Shipping Gazette, Thursday, February 28, 1924, p. 8.]

One of the most pronounced effects of the Great War has been the stimulation of the maritime ambitions of foreign nations. In order to develop their shipping and shipbuilding industries numerous countries have not hesitated to resort to risky experiments in State shipowning and to costly subsidies to shipbuilders. There is, of course, the outstanding case of the United States, but that great country is far from being alone in its attempt to build up a shipping fleet by artificial aid. Our own Dominions of Canada and Australia have instituted State shipping and shipbuilding programs—of doubtful value so far—and India is now seeking to develop a fleet of her own by adventitious means. In Europe, France and Italy have both embarked on State-assisted shipbuilding, while Germany has made the most strenuous attempt to resuscitate her mercantile marine by a system of subsidies to shipowners, which has cost the country an enormous sum, even if it is in process of succeeding in its purpose. Spain, too, it will have been seen from an announcement made in our columns yesterday, has a system of subsidies to shipbuilders which, as modified by a royal decree issued a few days ago, provides for payments ranging from 118 pesetas per ton gross for wooden sailing vessels to 407 pesetas per ton gross for iron or steel power-driven passenger ships, with an additional 10 per cent premium on the latter for each mile if the trial speed of the vessel exceeds 14 miles an hour. The maximum sum to be applied to payment of these subsidies has been fixed at 8,000,000 pesetas per annum, and the Government reserves the right to control coastal freights when that is considered desirable.

Mr. CAPPER. I present a resolution adopted by the Panhandle Producers' Association at its annual convention in Amarillo, Tex., in favor of the repeal of section 15a of the transportation act, which I ask be referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce and printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the resolution was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolution.

Whereas Senator ARTHUR CAPPER, of Kansas, has introduced in the Senate of the United States a bill known as S. 91 to repeal section 15a of the transportation act that fixes a method of making rates on a basis of paying 5½ per cent on the aggregate value of all railroad property of the country, that has resulted in the enormous increases in rates since the war and limited the power and judgment of the Interstate Commerce Commission to that sort of a standard and at the same time taken away in its effect the power of the State commission to make reasonable rates not in conformity therewith and abridged the remedies of the shipper to correct exorbitant rates; and

Whereas said bill (S. 91) would restore to the Interstate Commerce Commission and to the State commission the power to adjust and prescribe rates according to the facts, so as to make them just and reasonable to the shipper, the public, and the carrier, as that power existed and was successfully and fairly exercised before the war, according to the sound judgment of the commission in such case; and

Whereas all of the livestock producers' associations, State and National, have repeatedly demanded the repeal of section 15a, as have State legislatures and State railroad commissions throughout the country; and the American National Live Stock Association at its recent convention at Omaha and the Kansas State Live Stock Association at its recent convention at Wichita indorsed said bill, which, if enacted, means a return to the standard of reasonableness according to the judgment of the commission upon full hearing of the facts of each case and restoration of the shippers' rights and remedies: Now therefore be it

Resolved by the Panhandle Producers' Association at its annual convention at Amarillo, Tex., March 4 and 5, 1924, That we indorse said bill and urge our Congressmen to work for the enactment of the same, and that copies of the resolution be sent to Senator CAPPER and our Congressmen and Senators.

(Signed) H. C. HARDING, Secretary.

PLAN FOR MAKING THE FOREST RESERVES PRODUCTIVE.

Mr. FLETCHER. I ask to have printed in the RECORD a very thoughtful article by the Hon. Martin Dodge, former Director United States Public Roads, entitled "A plan for making the forest reserves productive."

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A Japanese statesman recently said, "The American cares for his country because he believes it belongs to him; a Japanese cares for his country because he believes he belongs to it." This marks the most fundamental difference between the oriental attitude of mind to society and country and the western or newer and prevailing attitude of mind as to the social fabric, the country, and its government. Our people think well of their country because they think they own it, and the reason why they think so is because, as a general rule, it has proved to be true from the earliest settlements in our country up until the present time, or at least quite recently. This idea of ownership is based primarily and originally upon the ownership of land, and the ownership of agricultural land since the formation of the Republic has been quite equally distributed.

Under the homestead law, 160 acres has generally been allowed to each claimant and 320 acres has generally been the maximum. The long and uniform operation of this law has resulted in a just apportionment of the public domain into the hands of the most numerous and most useful body of our citizens. It has given employment to the unemployed; it has turned the wilderness into an empire and it has made the desert blossom like a rose. The bridle path has been changed into a double-track railroad and the land value of a single county has become equal to the purchase price of the Louisiana Territory.

SOURCES OF WEALTH.

This just and liberal distribution of our public lands became the moving cause which determined our people to turn their backs on the ocean and their faces to the land, and it was only on account of this that we developed our great inland empire and added within 50 years tenfold to the commonwealth of the Nation. Our people made no mistake when they turned their backs on the god of the ocean and joined in their devotion to the gods of the hills and the gods of the valleys, because it is out of these hills and valleys that we take our mighty wealth and our mighty industry.

Many think we have now come to a crisis in the destiny of our country, and possibly in the destiny of the world, and at this time of crisis it behooves us to examine the foundation upon which our prosperity has been built and see if we have removed any of the supports that have contributed to its support.

All ancient empires regarded the subject as belonging to the empire, and this ancient idea has been handed down for the most part to the present day as expressed by the Japanese statesman when he says that his countrymen belong to his country. How lately and how narrowly we have escaped from that attitude of mind can be shown by referring to the feudal system which prevailed for a thousand years in western Europe. And in the early history of the Colonies in this country it was largely enforced. The three great States of Virginia, Maryland, and Pennsylvania were granted almost entirely to three great landed proprietors: Lord Fairfax, Lord Baltimore, and William Penn. Had we not escaped that feudal tenure of land and substituted for it our new and more equitable distribution of the public lands under the General Government, it is hardly possible that we could have witnessed the beneficial results which are so apparent in the development of our country, and especially when we remember that the tenure of land formerly controlled the tenure of office, and does yet, to a great extent, in many places.

QUOTING FROM WEBSTER.

Daniel Webster, the great expounder of the Constitution, said in his speech on the two hundredth anniversary of the landing of the Pilgrims that—

> "A republican form of government rests not more on political constitutions than on those laws which regulate the descent and transmission of property. * * * The true principle of a free and popular government would seem to be so to construct it as to give to all, or at least to a very great majority, an interest in its preservation, to found it as other things are founded—on men's interests. * * * The freest government, if it could exist, would not be long acceptable if the tendency of the laws were to create a rapid accumulation of property in few hands and to render the great mass of the population dependent and penniless. * * * In the nature of things, those who have not property and see their neighbors possess much more than they think them to need, can not be favorable to laws made for the protection of property. When this class becomes numerous, it grows clamorous; it looks on property as its prey and plunder and is naturally ready at all time for violence and revolution."

The great number of unemployed in this country at the present time and the heavy taxation of business and property and the consequent derangement of our industries and transportation make many wonder if anything better remains for the people than to pay in peace and die in war. The accumulated wisdom of a thousand years should teach us that we can not retain and maintain a republican form of government without a just and reasonable distribution of property.

The only great republic that ever existed before ours made it a cardinal point to distribute its public lands equitably among its people, and when they finally failed to secure that the great republic passed away.

There is a remarkable similarity between the tenure of land under the Roman Republic and the tenure of land under our Republic. The agrarian laws of Rome caused the greatest division among her people and brought on the civil war between the tribunes of the people and the senate. The Gracchi brothers contended for the distribution of the land that no one could own more than 500 Roman acres (jugera), each containing 28,000 square feet. Our acre contains 43,560 square feet. Five hundred Roman acres are almost exactly equal to 320 of our acres, the variation being less than a quarter of an acre. These two greatest of the Roman tribunes both gave up their lives in trying to resist the encroachments of the great landowners upon the smaller landowners. And when the time came that the small landowner, like our homesteader, was overshadowed by great estates and great interests the republic was lost. It is startling to consider how parallel the contention in Rome was to that which has happened in our own country, not only to the exact quantity that might be held by any one person but to the difficulty of the smaller claimant holding out against the large one.

PUBLIC LANDS "EXHAUSTED."

A Senator in Congress and a Commissioner of the Land Office were both indicted for complicity in transferring land from the small holder to the large holder, contrary to the intention of the law. Nearly every senator in the Roman senate was engaged in similar transactions, and with their own hands struck down Tiberius Gracchus, who introduced the agrarian law which sought to limit the number of acres to exactly the limit which we have fixed in our own homestead act.

I have heard all my life that the last of the public lands had been exhausted. I used to suppose, of course, that this was all true, but I have lived to see that it was only apparently true; that in reality most of the great inland empire which was thought to be undesirable or worthless turned out to be exceedingly valuable, and there is yet remaining in the public lands vast areas more suitable for human habitation than much of that that has been already appropriated under the homestead act.

The Government itself, of late years, instead of regarding itself as trustee for its citizens in the ownership of land, has reversed the former policy and has become an imperial landlord, having withdrawn from the citizens the right of the homestead act as applied to all forest lands, stone and timber lands, oil lands, gas lands, water-power lands, and coal lands; in fact, all the valuable lands have been denied to our citizens. And to that extent we are by this new policy adopting the autocratic method by which the citizen no longer owns the country but the country owns the citizen. This, the writer thinks, is a fundamental error unjustified by any precedent, by any principle, or by any necessity; but, on the contrary, is attended by many harmful results which border on danger and even on destruction. Much of the vast areas covered by the forest reserve are not covered with timber at all, and all that is covered by timber is suitable for human habitation. The theory of the conservationist is that this timber will be needed for other people in the distant future. That is very unlikely, because timber has lost its value as a fuel and almost lost its use as necessary building material. Very little timber is allowed in fireproof construction which is required in increasing proportions by city building regulations. In bridges, docks, and viaducts, and nearly all forms of permanent construction it has ceased to be a component part. It is not only not allowed, but it is undesirable.

THE WRITER'S PLAN.

My plan to utilize this great area to a greater extent and to a more beneficial use is to amend the homestead act so that every alternate section of this land shall be opened up to the homestead settler. That is not a new method. The western railroads, except the Great Northern, were promoted by the Government's granting every alternate section to the railroad company which should build the road. The remaining alternate sections were to be raised from $1.25 to $2.50 per acre, so that the total receipts from the sale of land would not be diminished. This worked abundantly well and gave us the greatest and best system of cheap long-distance overland transportation that was ever seen in the history of the world. The wisdom of that enterprise is shown by the fact that the Government got the full price for the land, got the railroad, and, most of all, got the development of the country, which added so manyfold to its value. Now, this can be duplicated in a very simple way by allowing each homesteader to take up 160 acres of land located in any of the alternate sections, according to the checkerboard method by which our lands are laid out. Each section contains 640 acres, or enough for four 160-acre farms. For the purpose of communication between these sections, a road 60 feet wide shall be designated along every section line. There will be no loss to the Government in giving this advantage to the citizen, because the value of the remaining land will be doubled, as it was by the construction of the railroad, and much more than doubled. In addition to this, the opening up of this vast territory would make the remaining sections owned by the Government accessible so that the ripe timber could be marketed, and the value of that would be more than the value of the whole left in vast and inaccessible areas where much of it burns and more of it rots.

FIRE PROTECTION.

But of still greater advantage than the two mentioned above is the fire protection. If every alternate section is turned into a farm, that in itself furnishes a fire protection for the remaining timber. We have no trouble about forest fires except where the forest is continuous. By breaking up these great areas in the manner suggested, we would save the loss by fire, save the money now provided by millions to fight fires, save the loss which occurs by the decay of the overripe timber and double its value by reason of its being made more accessible. There is no doubt whatever that the half of this timber made accessible is worth more than the whole under the present method of holding. We have inclosed within this forest area more than 180,000,000 acres, not counting the national parks. This would furnish room for a million homesteads, and their value would be almost inestimable to the homesteaders and quite beyond computation as an addition to the Commonwealth. The very great extent of the forest reserve can be better appreciated by referring to the fact that it covers an area equal in extent to all the land from the Atlantic Ocean to the Mississippi River and north of the Ohio.

It would be better to people this great area with our own hardy pioneers and thereby make it a white man's country than leave it unprotected to become a prey of the Japanese, the Chinese, and the Hindu.

We hear much talk about armament and protection. There could be no greater protection to the Pacific coast than to have it peopled by a hardy race of our countrymen that can bear the white man's burden.

Cicero, in one of his great orations, said the gods of the ancient world had protected Rome by placing the Alps between it and the barbarians, but when Cæsar had conquered Gaul he said that Cæsar become a greater protection than the Alps.

In all the history of the past nations could and did retire behind the barriers of nature and thereby found protection. They might cross a river or a mountain or a desert or the ocean and there would find their security, but now all these barriers of nature have been overcome and no longer furnish protection, consequently it is more important than ever that we, as a Nation, should not take our refuge so much in the former methods as by putting our own people as our outposts and protectors. America first, and none but Americans on guard.

It was the wish of Jefferson that the Atlantic Ocean might be an ocean of fire instead of an ocean of water. If that wish could become true, most of our dangers would cease.

Attention is called to the fact that this plan calls for no appropriation of money, but, on the contrary, saves many millions that are now expended with no profit and probably no benefit.

SALE OF GOVERNMENT SECURITIES.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I have here a letter from the cashier of a national bank in the State of Washington with reference to the Government selling securities and the effect which the bankers think that policy has on the deposits in the banks. I submitted the letter to the Secretary of the Treasury, and I have his answer to it, together with a circular which the department has issued. I ask that the letter with the reply from the Secretary of the Treasury and the circular may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE NATIONAL BANK OF GOLDENDALE,
GOLDENDALE, WASH., February 28, 1924.

Hon. WESLEY L. JONES,
Washington, D. C.

HONORABLE SIR: We have heard recently that the Government had discontinued the sale of their Treasury certificates in certain districts where wheat farming was carried on, and which they felt the funds were needed in the banks for taking care of the needs of the community, and also that they might save the banks from going down.

It occurs to us that the country and city banks have a very hard competitor in the Government. For instance, they sell their securities at a rate which no bank can pay and survive, especially during the present conditions, and it would seem the fair thing to us if they would get down on their interest rate to at least make it a fair competition, for they would get some of the money needed in the various districts even at a 3 or 3½ per cent rate.

All communities, so we are informed, especially this of ours, are losing from their banks much of the money that should remain in the banks for the support of the community. It has been put up to us many times that we could not meet the rate offered by the Government, so they must buy Government paper with the higher rate of interest.

We would appreciate an expression from you on this line and as to whether it would meet with your ideas to use your efforts for this purpose.

Yours very truly, C. E. CROOKS, Cashier.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE UNDERSECRETARY,
Washington, March 7, 1924.

Hon. W. L. JONES,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I have your letter of March 6, 1924, inclosing a letter received by you from the cashier of the National Bank of Goldendale, Wash., suggesting a reduction in the interest yield of Treasury savings certificates. The letter inclosed by you is herewith returned.

I regret that this Washington bank feels that in selling Treasury savings certificates the Treasury is competing with banking institutions for deposits. The Treasury has no intention of competing with banks for deposits and it would be surprised if, contrary to the experience of the past, savings deposits should fall off as a result of the effort to sell Treasury savings certificates. If the habit of thrift and saving can be instilled in the minds of the people, and if a small portion of the many millions of dollars annually lost through fraud and speculation can be diverted into legitimate channels, a great good will have been accomplished, and the farmer, the laborer, all classes of industry, and the bankers themselves will be directly benefited.

I feel sure that a careful perusal of the inclosed mimeographed statement will convince you that Treasury savings certificates represent investments rather than deposits, and are not intended to and really do not compete with bank deposits. Extra copies of this statement are inclosed for your use.

An erroneous impression has been given out to the effect that the Treasury Department is draining the country of funds by the sale of these certificates. As a matter of fact, there was outstanding in the hands of the public at the end of 1918 nearly a billion dollars' worth of these savings securities. On December 31, 1922, this amount was reduced to $729,000,000, and on December 31, 1923, to $376,000,000. The Treasury can not be accused of draining funds from the country when it has returned to the people in one year, from this source alone, $353,000,000 above all receipts from the sale of savings securities over the same period of time. The contention, therefore, by certain banks and banking associations that the Government savings program has caused withdrawals, and has taken vast sums of money away from certain sections of the country, is unwarranted and is based on the erroneous conclusion that recent withdrawals have been made because of the sale of Treasury savings certificates, when as a matter of fact any unusual withdrawal has been the natural sequence of recent developments in the affected territory.

According to a statement recently issued by the American Bankers' Association the total amount of savings deposits in the United States on June 30, 1922, was $17,831,000,000, and on June 30, 1923, was $18,373,000,000, an increase of more than $1,000,000,000, or about 6 per cent for the year. I am convinced that this offering of savings securities does not operate in any manner adversely to the interests of savings or commercial banks, and that the interest yield thereof is not unduly high. Your special attention is invited to the fact that Treasury savings certificates yield 4½ per cent, compounded semiannually, only when held for five years to maturity. If redeemed before maturity, they yield but 3½ per cent, compounded semiannually, a rate suggested by your correspondence as proper. If these investment securities are to be compared with bank deposits, it is only fair that this 3½ per cent rate be used in such a comparison, inasmuch as savings-bank deposits may be withdrawn at the end of any six months' period without forfeiture of interest.

Very truly yours,

GARRARD B. WINSTON,
Undersecretary of the Treasury.

THE TREASURY SAVINGS CERTIFICATES.

(By H. E. Sargent.)

[Reprint from the Annalist, issue of February 11, 1924.]

Unprecedented but effective is the campaign of the banks of the West and the Northwest to end the sale of Treasury savings certificates. Thus far the clamor of the banks against these small denomination Government securities has resulted in the administration ordering their sale stopped in 18 States, and the indications are that these orders will be broadened to take in more territory, as protests are now coming in from some of the Eastern States.

Originating in the northwestern section of the country, where the banking situation has been going from bad to worse, the campaign against the Treasury savings certificates has spread rapidly to the banks and banking associations of the rest of the country until an almost unheard-of pressure has been exerted upon the Government to cease this form of financing. Primarily, the banks believe that the competition of the Treasury savings certificates, which bear interest at 4½ per cent if held until maturity—five years—has resulted in the depletion of savings deposits, and in some instances in the closing of banks.

The banks contend that the 4½ per cent rate offered by the Government is unfair when the sale of tax-exempt securities is pushed among investors who are accustomed to deposit their funds with savings banks, where the average rate is about 3 per cent. As the popularity of the Treasury savings certificates increased people withdrew their funds on deposit in savings accounts more and more and intrusted them to the Government in return for the savings certificates, which were to be had in denominations as small as $20.

Superficially, the efforts of the banks have so far induced the Government to suspend temporarily the flotation of these small securities, but actually the Treasury has been forced into a position where it must decide whether it will attempt to breast the storm of banking disapproval and again market the savings certificates or abandon what has come to be an important factor in national financing. In 1923 about $181,000,000 worth of these savings certificates were sold. This means that a like amount of the public debt was refunded into issues of varying maturities which could be met out of ordinary revenues. Repetition of the 1923 sales over a short period of years would transform an appreciable amount of the public debt into these small issues. On the other hand, defeat of the savings certificates program will mean that the Treasury must finance in other ways.

Oddly enough, there has been no attempt on the part of the administration to justify its move in suspending the sale of the certificates, although there are now approximately 3,500,000 individual holders of these securities. Started as a means of encouraging thrift among the small-salaried classes and direct dealings with the Government, the only official explanation of the suspension of sales which has come from the White House has been the report that the banks objected to the issues.

Claims of the banks, however, appear to be poorly bulwarked by facts. Analysis of the savings-bank deposits in the Northwest, where the opposition had its beginning, bring out two main facts, namely, that savings-bank deposits last year increased in greater proportion than did the sale of Treasury savings certificates, and that the increased sale of Treasury savings certificates did not decrease savings deposits, while more money was returned to the purchasers of these securities than was taken from them by new sales. One of the principal arguments of the banks is that the Treasury has been taking out of communities funds which were ordinarily retained for local use in savings deposits.

Government operations with Treasury savings certificates began in January, 1922, when there was a maturity of approximately $625,000,000 of the 1918 series of war-savings stamps to be met. Practically this entire amount has been paid back to the holders of this series of certificates, many of the maturing certificates having been exchanged for Treasury savings certificates. Again, in January, 1923, the Treasury had the 1919 series of war-savings certificates to redeem in the amount of $65,000,000. It is estimated that more than 50 per cent of these were exchanged for Treasury savings certificates in January, 1923. These exchanges took no new money from the locality in which the holders resided.

Taking the situation from the Treasury standpoint, there were outstanding at the end of 1918 nearly a billion dollars' worth of savings securities. On December 31, 1922, this amount was reduced to $729,000,000, and on December 31, 1923, there was a further reduction to $376,000,000. In other words, in one year's time the Treasury returned to the holders of these savings securities $353,000,000 more than all receipts from the sale of savings securities for the same period of time. According to the reports of the American Bankers' Association the total amount of savings deposits in the United States on June 30, 1922, was $17,331,000,000, and on June 30, 1923, was $18,373,000,000, or an increase of more than $1,000,000,000, or about 6 per cent for the year. The total amount of savings certificates oustanding on June 30, 1922, was $678,000,000, and on June 30, 1923, was $337,000,000, a decrease of $341,000,000, or about 50 per cent for the year.

The conclusion, therefore, may be drawn that the sale of Treasury savings certificates and the Government's savings program did not cause a decline in savings deposits, despite a larger sale and wider distribution throughout the country in the same year.

Carrying the analysis into the ninth Federal reserve district—the Northwest—where the Treasury savings certificates have been cited as the cause of many bank failures, the same discrepancy between argument and figures appears. Notwithstanding the bank failures in that section, savings deposits increased from $83,793,000 on January 1, 1923, to $92,410,000 on January 1, 1924. That is, in one year savings deposits increased more than $8,500,000. The total sales of Treasury savings certificates for the same year amounted to approximately $10,000,000, and the Federal reserve bank at Minneapolis, acting as fiscal agents for the Government, redeemed to the holders of 1918 war-savings certificates approximately $21,500,000. In other words, more than twice the amount of money that was put into Treasury savings certificates in the ninth Federal reserve district was returned to the holders of the maturing certificates in that district in 1923.

The final outcome of the drive against Treasury savings certificates is yet to be determined, but their discontinuance will mean the loss to the Government of the cheapest money it is receiving. Short-term certificates of indebtedness, which are issued quarterly to meet Federal expenses between tax claimants, have an interest rate of between 4 and 4½ per cent. There are incidental privileges, such as the right to purchase these short-term securities on credit, which increase their value to the purchaser and their cost to the Government. Liberty bonds at their present market rate net the purchaser about 4.3 per cent and cost the Government when issued an average of about 4½ per cent. Any investor can buy Liberties, sell them at any time—not waiting for five years, as is required for Treasury savings certificates—and make 4½ per cent, as against the savings-certificate rate of 3½ per cent if cashed before maturity. The majority of Treasury savings certificates redeemed before maturity cost the Government only 3½ per cent, and the average cost is less than 4 per cent. The actual cost of the Treasury savings certificate selling campaign in 1923 was only about one-fifth of 1 per cent.

The Treasury frankly confesses that it needs the money obtained from the savings certificates. It holds that the popularity of the certificates has been demonstrated, that the figures for the last two years show that they have not competed with or decreased savings deposits, and that their discontinuance would be a loss not only to many people who have learned to save for the first time through their purchase, but to the National Government.

ACCOUNTS OF THE FARM-LOAN COMMISSIONER.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from a previous day, which will be read.

The reading clerk read the resolution (S. Res. 190) submitted by Mr. HOWELL on the 11th instant, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to furnish to the Senate a statement in detail of the funds that have been covered into the account of the Farm Loan Commissioner, together with a statement of the source of said funds in each case and the date of each disbursement from said account.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, I ask that consent be given that the resolution may be considered at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There being no objection, the resolution was considered and agreed to.

INVESTIGATION OF DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY SPECIAL COMMITTEE.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, on yesterday morning I submitted a further resolution in reference to the investigation of the Department of Justice. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the resolution at this time.

Mr. ROBINSON. What is the number of the resolution?

Mr. BROOKHART. I do not know the number of the resolution, but I offered it on yesterday.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is informed that the resolution has not as yet been reported by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to which it was referred. The resolution is therefore still before the committee.

Mr. BROOKHART. I shall try to have the resolution reported later in the day, and shall then ask for its consideration. The chairman of the committee told me that the resolution would be reported this morning.

INVESTIGATION OF INTERNAL REVENUE BUREAU.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Senate Resolution 168 may be now considered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the title of the resolution for the information of the Senate.

The READING CLERK. A resolution (S. Res. 168) submitted by Mr. COUZENS February 21, 1924, authorizing the appointment of a special committee to investigate the Bureau of Internal Revenue.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Michigan asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, then I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the resolution.

Mr. JONES of Washington. That can not be done at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair doubts if the motion of the Senator from Michigan is in order at this time.

Mr. COUZENS. When will my motion be in order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. After the morning business shall have been closed. Morning business has not as yet been completed. Is there further morning business? If not, morning business is closed.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the calendar, unobjected bills only to be considered, and that we begin the consideration of the calendar where it was left off on yesterday.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator from Washington yield for a moment in order that the Senator from Michigan [Mr. COUZENS] may make his motion?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I should have no objection to that.

Mr. KING. I desire to say to the Senator that the resolution for which the Senator from Michigan desires consideration comes from the Finance Committee, and the chairman of that committee and Senators on both sides are in favor of the resolution.

Mr. ROBINSON. May I inquire if the report of the committee on Resolution 168, which the Senator from Michigan now suggests be considered, is unanimous?

Mr. COUZENS. I do not know. The chairman of the Committee on Finance, the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], reported the resolution on yesterday.

Mr. KING. I think I can answer the Senator from Arkansas that there are two or three members of the committee who are adverse to the resolution.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. The vote in the committee was 7 to 3, I understand, if I recall it correctly, in favor of reporting the resolution.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I will withhold my request if the Senator from Michigan desires to make his motion.

Mr. COUZENS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Michigan moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate Resolution 168, authorizing the appointment of a special committee to investigate the Bureau of Internal Revenue. [Putting the question.]

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The "ayes" have it.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I was addressing the Chair while he was putting the question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will recognize the Senator from New York.

Mr. WADSWORTH. As I understand, the motion now is that the Senate shall proceed to the consideration of the resolution?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York is correct.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Is the motion debatable?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion itself is not debatable, but if the resolution shall be taken up the resolution will be debatable.

Mr. McKELLAR. Has the motion to take up the resolution prevailed, and is the resolution now before the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York was on his feet while the Chair was putting the question on the motion. The Chair will now state that the motion is agreed to and the resolution is before the Senate.

The Senate proceeded to consider the resolution (S. Res. 168), which had been reported from the Committee on Finance with amendments.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, in connection with the pending resolution—while it was not intended to be in connection with it, still, as a matter of fact, it turns out to be so—I desire to state that since January 26 last I have had some correspondence from time to time with the Secretary of the Treasury in reference to revenue matters. I ask unanimous consent that the correspondence—it is not long, although it looks as though it were—may be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The correspondence referred to is as follows:

JANUARY 26, 1924.

Hon. ANDREW W. MELLON,
Secretary of the Treasury, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: It is being stated everywhere that many individuals receiving large incomes, where the tax or surtax is over 12½ per cent, have organized and are organizing corporations and transferring their properties to such corporations in order to evade the individual income tax law. Will you kindly advise me what your records show in reference to this.

It has been reported to me that Mr. P. S. du Pont, with whom I have had some correspondence about taxes recently, some years ago organized a corporation for the purpose of evading taxes, and that he is saving very large sums of money in that way, the corporation tax being 12½ per cent and the individual income tax, if he kept his properties in his own name, being far in excess of that rate.

Very respectfully yours,

KENNETH McKELLAR.

FEBRUARY 8, 1924.

Hon. CALVIN COOLIDGE,
The White House, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: Section 257 of the revenue act of November 23, 1921, provides:

> "That the returns upon which the tax has been determined by the commission shall constitute public records, but they shall be open to inspection only upon order of the President and under rules and regulations prescribed by the Secretary and approved by the President."

I have written a letter to Secretary Mellon, a copy of which I inclose. On the 26th day of January I wrote to Secretary Mellon, a copy of which first letter I also inclose. I have received no reply to the first letter.

I am sure you will agree with me that some reply should have been made, and I will greatly appreciate it if I may have your cooperation in being permitted to examine the tax returns referred to.

With great respect,

Very sincerely yours,

KENNETH McKELLAR.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: Section 257 of the revenue act approved November 23, 1921, provides:

> "That the returns upon which the tax has been determined by the commission shall constitute public records, but they shall be open to inspection only upon order of the President and under rules and regulations prescribed by the Secretary and approved by the President."

Will you kindly send me a copy of the rules and regulations under which a Senator may examine the tax returns of a taxpayer?

Very truly yours,

KENNETH McKELLAR.

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, February 11, 1924.

Hon. KENNETH McKELLAR,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR McKELLAR: Your letter of February 8, quoting from revenue act of 1921, and referring to your request for permission to examine certain tax returns, has been received. I shall at once bring the matter to the attention of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Very truly yours,

CALVIN COOLIDGE.

[Received by messenger February 13, 1924.]

THE SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY,
Washington, February 8, 1924.

Hon. KENNETH McKELLAR,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I have your letter of January 26, requesting information in connection with the organization of corporations to avoid the imposition of the surtax. Section 220 of the revenue act is designed to penalize corporations fraudulently availed of to escape the imposition of the surtax on their stockholders. This section has been ineffective for two reasons: First, it is questionable whether any investment company could have a surplus beyond the reasonable needs of its business, since its sole business was to invest. Second, the penalty provided by section 220 was based upon the taxable income of the corporation. If the corporation invested solely in Government securities exempt as to normal tax, or in the stock of other domestic corporations, under the law it had no taxable income and therefore the penalty of 25 per cent was a penalty of 25 per cent of nothing. This defect in the statute, I have been told, has been recognized by many lawyers and avoidance entirely within the law has been possible. In the bill now pending in the House both of these defects are cured by providing that the fact that the corporation was a mere investment company is prima facie evidence of fraudulent purpose and by fixing the penalty of 25 per cent of the income of the corporation, even though such income is not taxable under the law. If this bill is passed, I think we can pretty effectually stop this method of tax avoidance.

Knowledge of instances where this practice has been adopted can only come to the notice of the department when the actual returns of the corporations are audited, but the bureau is making every endeavor to enforce section 220 in all cases where it can be found to be applicable.

The audit of the P. S. du Pont cases, to which you refer, has not been completed, but the commissioner has requested the auditors to ascertain whether or not any of these companies is subject to the provisions of section 220 of the revenue acts of 1918 and 1921. Waivers have been filed in these cases and there is no danger of their being barred by the statute.

Very truly yours,

A. W. MELLON,
Secretary of the Treasury.

THE SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY,
Washington, February 13, 1924.

Hon. KENNETH McKELLAR,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I have your letter of February 8. I inclose herewith a copy of income-tax regulations 62. The regulations with respect to publicity of returns are articles 1090 to 1094, inclusive, commencing at page 278. In general it is to be noted that a copy of the return is available only when the United States is interested or to some one tracing his authority from the taxpayer. An inspection of the return is available in general to officers of the Treasury Department carrying out their official duties and to those having some direct connection with the taxpayer.

Section 3167 of the Revised Statutes makes it unlawful to divulge the contents of a return or to print or publish in any manner whatsoever not provided by law any income return. I do not believe that under the law I have the authority to authorize an inspection by you of the returns of the du Pont case, referred to in your previous letter.

Very truly yours,

A. W. MELLON,
Secretary of the Treasury.

(One inclosure.)

THE SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY,
Washington, February 13, 1924.

Hon. KENNETH McKELLAR,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I received from Mr. Slemp, secretary to the President, copies of your two letters to me of January 26 and February 8. The letter of January 26 I answered a day or so ago, and I have to-day answered your letter of February 8. I want to assure you that there has been no unnecessary delay in answering your inquiries. There has, however, been a great quantity of mail coming through my office recently which has interfered a little with the prompt handling of correspondence.

Very truly yours,

A. W. MELLON,
Secretary of the Treasury.

EVASION OF SURTAXES BY INCORPORATION.

SEC. 220. That if any corporation, however created or organized, is formed or availed of for the purpose of preventing the imposition of the surtax upon its stockholders or members through the medium of permitting its gains and profits to accumulate instead of being divided or distributed, there shall be levied, collected, and paid for each taxable year upon the net income of such corporation a tax equal to 25 per cent of the amount thereof, which shall be in addition to the tax imposed by section 230 of this title and shall be computed, collected, and paid upon the same basis and in the same manner and subject to the same provisions of law, including penalties, as that tax: Provided, That if all the stockholders or members of such corporation agree thereto the commissioner may, in lieu of all income, war-profits, and excess-profits taxes imposed upon the corporation for the taxable year, tax the stockholders or members of such corporation upon their distributive shares in the net income of the corporation for the taxable year in the same manner as provided in subdivision (a) of section 218 in the case of members of a partnership. The fact that any corporation is a mere holding company, or that the gains and profits are permitted to accumulate beyond the reasonable needs of the business, shall be prima facie evidence of a purpose to escape the surtax; but the fact that the gains and profits are in any case permitted to accumulate and become surplus shall not be construed as evidence of a purpose to escape the tax in such case unless the commissioner certifies that in his opinion such accumulation is unreasonable for the purposes of the business. When requested by the commissioner or any collector every corporation shall forward to him a correct statement of such gains and profits and the names and addresses of the individuals or shareholders who would be entitled to the same, if divided or distributed, and of the amounts that would be payable to each.

ART. 351. Profits of corporation taxable to stockholders.—Where a domestic or foreign corporation permits its gains and profits to accumulate for the purpose of preventing the imposition of the surtax upon such income if distributed to its stockholders, it shall be subject to an income tax at 25 per cent in addition to the taxes imposed by section 230 of the statute. If, however, all the stockholders agree thereto, the commissioner may, in lieu of all income, war-profits, and excess-profits taxes imposed upon the corporation for the taxable year, tax them upon their distributive shares in the net income of the corporation for the taxable year, as provided in subdivision (a) of section 218, in the case of members of a partnership. In any case the commissioner or a collector may require a corporation to furnish a statement of its gains and profits and of the names, addresses, and shareholding of the stockholders and of the amounts that would be payable to each.

ART. 352. Purpose to escape surtax.—Section 220 of the statute applies where a corporation is formed or availed of for the purpose of preventing the imposition of the surtax upon its stockholders or members by permitting its gains and profits to accumulate instead of being divided or distributed. Prima facie evidence of a purpose to escape the surtax exists where a corporation has practically no business except holding stocks, securities, or other property and collecting the income therefrom or where a corporation other than a mere holding company permits its gains and profits to accumulate beyond the reasonable needs of the business. The business of a corporation is not limited to that which it has previously carried on, but in general includes any line of business which it may legitimately undertake. However, a radical change of business when a considerable surplus has been accumulated may afford evidence of a purpose to escape the surtax. When one corporation owns the stock of another corporation in the same or a related line of business and in effect operates the other corporation, the business of the latter may be considered in substance the business of the first corporation. Gains and profits of the first corporation put into the second through the purchase of stock or otherwise may therefore, if a subsidiary relationship is established, constitute employment of the income in its own business. To establish that the business of one corporation can be regarded as including the business of another it is ordinarily essential that the first corporation own substantially all of the stock of the second. Investment by a corporation of its income in stock and securities of another corporation is not without anything further to be regarded as employment of the income in its business.

ART. 353. Unreasonable accumulation of profits.—An accumulation of gains and profits is unreasonable if it is not required for the purposes of the business, considering all the circumstances of the case. No attempt can be made to enumerate all the ways in which gains and profits of a corporation may be accumulated for the reasonable needs of the business. Undistributed income is properly accumulated if invested in increased inventories or additions to plant reasonably needed by the business. It is properly accumulated if retained for working capital required by the business or in accordance with contract obligations placed to the credit of a sinking fund for the purpose of retiring bonds issued by the corporation. In the case of a banking institution the business of which is to receive and loan money, using capital, surplus, and deposits for that purpose, undistributed income actually represented by loans or reasonably retained for future loans if not accumulated beyond the reasonable needs of the business. The nature of the investment of gains and profits is immaterial if they are not in fact needed in the business.

FEBRUARY 19, 1924.

Hon. A. W. MELLON,
Secretary of the Treasury, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: I received your letter of the 13th in which you decline to allow an inspection by me of the tax returns therein mentioned. I am wondering to what extent this secrecy goes. Does it apply only to tax returns or does it apply to tax settlements, which are necessarily in the nature of litigation?

The Constitution of the United States, Article I, section 9, among other things, provides: "No money shall be drawn from the Treasury but in consequence of appropriations made by law, and a regular statement and account of the receipts and expenditures of all public money shall be published from time to time."

There are two matters which, I believe, come within the purview of this constitutional provision, concerning which I desire to inquire of you.

First. I have been informed that in the summer of 1921 a refund was paid to the Gulf Refining Co. and its subsidiary corporations of something more than $4,000,000. I do not believe that such a settlement comes within the secrecy provision of the income-tax return statute. If it was paid it must have been paid out of some appropriation. It should show in any statements of receipts and expenditures provided for by the Constitution. I would greatly appreciate it if you would give me full information as to this settlement. What was the amount claimed and what was the exact amount paid? What appropriation was it paid from, and does it appear as a separate item in the published statement of disbursements if such a settlement was, in fact, made?

I will greatly appreciate it if you will have this matter examined into and report to me.

Second. I next wish to inquire about the Atlantic, Gulf & West Indies Co. I have been informed that an additional assessment for 1918 of $15,000,000 was made against this company, and that there was a fraud penalty of 50 per cent in addition. Also that this company transferred its securities at par to a Mexican corporation which it organized, presumably for the purpose of escaping the tax; that the case was finally settled for $2,500,000. I would like to have the facts in reference to this case also. I do not think it comes within the secret tax return provision.

I am writing this letter for the purpose of seeking exact and accurate information. I know your records will furnish this information, and it may be that these settlements were proper. Still, as a Member of Congress, I desire to have the facts.

With much respect,

Very truly yours,

KENNETH MCKELLAR.

THE SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY,
Washington, March 5, 1924.

Hon. KENNETH MCKELLAR,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I have your letter of February 19, in which you make inquiry as to the basis for the settlement of the taxes due from the Gulf Refining Co. in 1921, and also the settlement of taxes due and owing from the Atlantic, Gulf & West Indies Steamship Co.

Section 3167 of the Revised Statutes provides as follows:

"SEC. 3167. It shall be unlawful for any collector, deputy collector, agent, clerk, or other officer or employee of the United States to divulge or to make known in any manner whatever not provided by law to any person the operations, style of work, or apparatus of any manufacturer or producer visited by him in the discharge of his official duties, or the amount or source of income, profits, losses, expenditures, or any particular thereof, set forth or disclosed in any income return, or to permit any income return or copy thereof or any book containing any abstract or particulars thereof to be seen or examined by any person except as provided by law; and it shall be unlawful for any person to print or publish in any manner whatever not provided by law any income return, or any part thereof, or source of income, profits, losses, or expenditures appearing in any income return; and any offense against the foregoing provision shall be a misdemeanor and be punished by a fine not exceeding $1,000 or by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or both, at the discretion of the court; and if the offender be an officer or employee of the United States he shall be dismissed from office or discharged from employment."

From this section it is obvious that it would be unlawful for me to give to you complete information as to the settlement of these particular cases.

The refunds to the Gulf Co. and its subsidiaries were charged against three appropriations, depending upon the year in which the taxes refunded were originally collected. The payments were $766,112.29 out of the appropriation for "Refund of taxes illegally collected, 1918, and prior years"; $1,350,884.63 from a similar appropriation for 1919; and $1,211,143.07 for 1921.

The quotation from the Washington Post inserted in a recent issue of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD appears to be a copy of portions of reports to Congress of refunds which have been on file for some months, and, consequently, available to anyone's inspection.

The amount of the refunds and all details in connection with the settlement of the Gulf Co. cases were determined by the Bureau of Internal Revenue before my appointment as Secretary of the Treasury, although the actual payment of the amount refunded took place in April, 1921, shortly after I had become Secretary. I had no personal knowledge of these refunds at that time.

Referring to the Atlantic, Gulf & West Indies compromise, from information received by the Bureau of Internal Revenue it was believed that large additional taxes and penalties were due from this company for past years. Before an assessment of these taxes had been made it became apparent to the department that the taxpayer was insolvent, and the sole question for determination was not the amount of the tax, but the amount that the taxpayer could pay. Since almost all of the assets of the taxpayer were subject to prior lien and the general credit of the taxpayer was not good, the levying of an assessment and its attempted collection would have served only to throw the taxpayer into bankruptcy and to destroy the Government's chance of collecting anything. The department made a thorough investigation into the financial condition of the taxpayer and its available cash resources with the sole idea of obtaining for the United States the largest possible payment. A compromise of the tax liability was then entered into under section 3229 of the Revised Statutes for $1,280,000, and satisfaction of a judgment against the United States in the Court of Claims for $1,351,381.81, and interest from November 19 to December 15, 1923. That the taxpayer was in fact in a perilous financial situation is disclosed by the subsequent receivership of the Ward Line, which was one of the most important and by far the best known of its subsidiaries.

Very truly yours,

A. W. MELLON,
Secretary of the Treasury.

MARCH 11, 1924.

Hon. A. W. MELLON,
Secretary of the Treasury, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: Your letter of the 5th received and noted. The questions submitted are answered by you, and the only thing I have to add further is that I hope you will publish the refunds made by your department in 1921 and 1922 in the same way you published the refunds in 1923. I shall be glad to put the publication in the RECORD, as I did your statement in reference to refunds in 1923.

Very sincerely yours,

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, at this time I desire to call the attention of the Senate to two paragraphs in a letter I wrote to the Secretary of the Treasury on February 19 last, and two paragraphs of his reply to me of date March 5. First, in my letter to the Secretary of the Treasury, I stated:

There are two matters which I believe come within the purview of this constitutional provision, concerning which I desire to inquire of you.

First, I have been informed that in the summer of 1921 a refund was paid to the Gulf Refining Co. and its subsidiary corporations of something more than $4,000,000. I do not believe that such a settlement comes within the secrecy provision of the income-tax return statute. If it was paid, it must have been paid out of some appropriation. It should show in any statements of receipts and expenditures provided for by the Constitution. I would greatly appreciate it if you would give me full information as to this settlement. What was the amount claimed, and what was the exact amount paid? What appropriation was it paid from and does it appear as a separate item in the public statement of disbursements, if such a settlement was in fact made?

I will greatly appreciate it if you will have this matter examined into and report to me.

Second, I next wish to inquire about the Agwi Co. (Atlantic Gulf & West Indies Co.). I have been informed that an additional assessment for 1918 of $15,000,000 was made against this company, and that there was a fraud penalty of 50 per cent in addition. Also, that this company transferred its securities at par to a Mexican corporation which it organized, presumably for the purpose of escaping the tax; that the case was finally settled for $2,500,000. I would like to have the facts in reference to this case also. I do not think it comes within the secret tax return provision.

I am writing this letter for the purpose of seeking exact and accurate information. I know your records will furnish this information and it may be that these settlements were proper. Still, as a Member of Congress, I desire to have the facts.

On this subject on March 5 the Secretary wrote me as follows:

The refunds to the Gulf Co. and its subsidiaries were charged against three appropriations, depending upon the year in which the taxes refunded were originally collected. The payments were $766,112.29 out of the appropriation for "Refund of taxes illegally collected, 1918 and prior years"; $1,350,844.63 from a similar appropriation for 1919; and $1,211,143.07 for 1921.

I may say at this point that the Secretary does not make the addition, but by the process of simple addition the total amount refunded to the Gulf Refining Co., as shown by the Secretary, is $3,328,139.99.

I continue to read from the letter:

The quotation from the Washington Post inserted in a recent issue of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD appears to be a copy of portions of reports to Congress of refunds which have been on file for some months, and consequently available to anyone's inspection.

The amount of the refunds and all details in connection with the settlement of the Gulf Co. cases were determined by the Bureau of Internal Revenue before my appointment as Secretary of the Treasury, although the actual payment of the amount refunded took place in April, 1921, shortly after I had become Secretary. I had no personal knowledge of these refunds at that time.

Referring to the Atlantic, Gulf, and West Indies compromise, from information received by the Bureau of Internal Revenue it was believed that large additional taxes and penalties were due from this company for past years.

I digress here long enough to say that no statement is made as to whether the statement in my letter that additional taxation had been assessed at $22,500,000 was correct or incorrect. I now continue to read from the letter:

Before an assessment of these taxes had been made it became apparent to the department that the taxpayer was insolvent, and the sole question for determination was not the amount of the tax, but the amount that the taxpayer could pay. Since almost all of the assets of the taxpayer were subject to prior lien, and the general credit of the taxpayer was not good, the levying of an assessment and its attempted collection would have served only to throw the taxpayer into bankruptcy and to destroy the Government's chance of collecting anything. The department made a thorough investigation into the financial condition of the taxpayer and its available cash resources with the sole idea of obtaining for the United States the largest possible payment. A compromise of the tax liability was then entered into under section 3229 of the Revised States for $1,280,000 and satisfaction of a judgment against the United States in the Court of Claims for $1,351,381.81 and interest from November 19 to December 15, 1923. That the taxpayer was in fact in a perilous financial situation is disclosed by the subsequent receivership of the Ward Line, which was one of the most important and by far the best known of its subsidiaries.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. FLETCHER. I am a little puzzled about the statement that there were prior liens to taxes. I was under the impression that a tax constituted a first lien on the assets of a taxpayer.

Mr. McKELLAR. I so understand, Mr. President, but the purpose of my reading from the correspondence is to give the statement exactly as it is given by the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. FLETCHER. I understand that, of course, but the Secretary makes the point that this was an insolvent concern, and that there were outstanding liens against it to such an extent that they felt obliged to compromise in order to get anything. It seems to me that a tax constitutes a prior lien over mortgages or judgments or other liens. At any rate, I was under that impression.

Mr. McKELLAR. That is my understanding of the matter, but I am merely reading from this letter the statements made by the Secretary. My understanding of the situation is that the Government claimed $22,500,000 of taxes against this company, which had very large shipping interests in the West Indies and controlled a number of steamship lines. I had also understood that this tax claim of $22,500,000 had been settled by the Secretary for $2,500,000, as explained to him in my letter. The amount of the settlement is apparently just a little more than $2,500,000, about half of it being the amount of a judgment that it seems this company secured against the United States for some reason, and the other $1,200,000 or thereabout being the amount of money actually paid in taxes, which had been either assessed or which were proposed to be assessed against this company. Nothing is said by the Secretary about this company itself being in the hands of a receiver, but he does say that it was practically insolvent.

Mr. President, in addition to the very important facts contained in the Secretary's letters, one of the principal purposes of inserting these letters in the RECORD is to show the absolute necessity of publicity of income-tax returns. I put in the RECORD the other day a statement from the Secretary of the Treasury of refunds made during the year 1923 of a very enormous sum of money, something like $123,000,000 in one year. I asked the Secretary to give the figures for 1921 and 1922. I think these figures ought to be public property. I think these tax returns ought to be public property. When we come to think of such enormous refunds, it may be all right; but we can not investigate; I have no knowledge of it, and no other Senator has any knowledge of it, because we do not know what the facts are.

It may be that these enormous refunds are absolutely correct, and it may be that they are not; but surely we, as the people's representatives, should know what is going on, and especially is that so in view of the constitutional provision that the Government must make a report of the receipts and disbursements of the Government. How can such a report be made public unless we have some knowledge of what is going on, both in the matter of receipts and in the matter of disbursements?

I am putting these letters in the RECORD for the purpose of getting the Senate to read them and see just what the situation in the Internal Revenue Bureau is in respect to these matters, with the hope that when the revenue bill comes in here proper provisions as to publicity of tax returns may be put in that bill. I believe they ought to be put in that bill; I am confident that they will be put in that bill, so that hereafter no room for doubt or controversy may arise about these enormous refunds and about income taxes generally.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. FLETCHER. It seems to me the Senator's position is emphasized by a situation pictured by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] a few days ago. I have never seen or heard that statement questioned; but the statement was made that the clerk of the man in charge of this subject in the Treasury Department who directed a return to Mr. Doheny of some $40,000 is now in the employ of Mr. Doheny. That is a very significant situation. If that sort of thing is going on, it seems to me it is important to follow out the Senator's suggestion.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I have no knowledge about that, and I have no knowledge that there is anything wrong in the matters that I have brought to the attention of the Senate in this correspondence. I am making no charges. I do not desire to do that, because nobody knows—I do not know, and no one knows—but it does seem to me that in justice to the Secretary of the Treasury, and in justice to the Congress, and in justice to the people of this country we ought to have publicity of tax returns, so that there can not be any room for suspicion, there can not be any misunderstanding of the actual facts. I hope that when the Committee on Finance reports the revenue bill to this body it will contain a provision guaranteeing the publicity of tax returns in a proper way; and if such a provision is not put in the bill by the committee, I hope to have the privilege of offering an amendment of that kind on the floor of the Senate.

I strongly favor the resolution of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. COUZENS], favored its being favorably reported by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, and hope the Senate may adopt the resolution.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, may I ask the chairman of the committee, in charge of the resolution, or the Senator in charge of it, as to what is the necessity for having this investigation made by a select committee of the Senate?

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, for the past two or three months a great number of complaints have been coming to me because of my discussion with the Secretary of the Treasury about the surtax. Recently all of the developments indicate the desirability of improving the administrative features of the revenue law. I want to quote from a report issued by the National Industrial Conference Board of New York, made up of the American Cotton Manufacturers' Association, the American Electric Railway Association, the American Hardware Manufacturers' Association, and some 30 other manufacturers and industrial institutions. I am not going to take up the time of the Senate in going through this entire report, but I want to read the salient points that seem to indicate the desirability of going into the administrative features of the revenue law:

> Consideration by Congress of the plan submitted by Secretary Mellon has served to concentrate attention on rates of taxation and on elimination of specific taxes. The present report is limited to giving emphasis to the importance of and the imperative need for modifying and simplifying the administrative machinery and procedure.
> In taxation, it has been often stated, administration counts for nine-tenths and law for only one-tenth. While this statement may be an exaggeration, it can nevertheless be rightly asserted that a good law is weakened by inefficient or cumbersome administration, while sound and simple administration goes far to make even a poorer law endurable. It should be the aim of sound administration not only to procure the tax which the law has authorized but also to accomplish this end with a minimum of irritation to the taxpayer and with a minimum of inequity as between taxpayers. In the words of the Royal Commission on Income Tax of Great Britain, a country whose administration of the income tax has met with phenomenal success—
> > "Even good administration can not prevent taxation from being to some extent unpopular with those who contribute to it, because taxation deprives the citizen of a portion of his means and devotes it to objects with which he may have little acquaintance and less sympathy, but an administration that is sympathetic and scrupulously fair, while adopting proper safeguards against evasion, can do much to reconcile the taxpayer to his lot and convince him that within the limits of the statutes the tax has been laid upon him with due care and justice."
> Dissatisfaction with our present administration of the income tax is heard on all sides and complaints are not without justification. Cases of arbitrary and unreasonable assessments are by no means rare, a situation often due to immature judgment or lack of adequate knowledge on the part of the Government official or agent. Business firms are sometimes confronted with assessments that are many times the tax as finally determined, but the final determination of the tax often takes years, and in the meantime the threatened tax makes impossible business extensions and improvements which are necessary or desirable.

That, Mr. President, in substance, is the reason for the introduction of the resolution, and is the primary reason why I urge its adoption by the Senate.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I am grateful to the Senator from Michigan for the explanation which he has given us, and with much that he has read from the document he held I am in sympathy. From time to time I have myself come into contact with the methods of the Bureau of Internal Revenue; and I realize as well, I think, as any other Senator that there is room for improvement in the administration of the income tax law.

Thus far I have had no reason to suspect anything wrong in the bureau. As a matter of fact, in the majority of the cases with which I have become at all familiar I seem to detect an attitude on the part of the bureau which, in army parlance, would be called "hard-boiled." Some of the assessments and some of the opinions of subordinates of the bureau have at times seemed to me to be, as that pamphlet expressed it, arbitrary, and perhaps inspired by the Shylock spirit of getting the last pound of flesh out of the taxpayer. What I want to know is, however, why can not the Finance Committee of the Senate conduct this investigation?

The revenue bill is now before the Finance Committee. As I understand, the revenue bill as it was passed by the House contains provisions for improving the administrative features of our tax laws, for setting up better machinery in the Internal Revenue Bureau, so that the conditions complained of shall not occur in the future. Why is it necessary to appoint a special or select committee of five Senators to investigate a subject which the Finance Committee now has before it? I anticipate that if the Senate continues to divide itself up into select committees to investigate everything under the sun we will not do any legislating.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator from New York at that point?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I do.

Mr. ROBINSON. Since the Finance Committee has jurisdiction of the legislation relating to internal revenue, it would, if practicable, be convenient to have that committee make the investigations upon which it is expected that corrective legislation shall be based; but the Committee on Finance has just entered upon a study of the revision of the internal revenue laws which passed the body at the other end of the Capitol a few days ago, and that work is of itself sufficient in volume and importance to consume the entire time of the committee. If the Committee on Finance should be resolved into an investigating committee, it is entirely probable that it would consume the next month or two in the work of investigation alone, and no progress whatever would be made on the revenue bill; so it would seem to me, in view of the peculiar conditions that exist, and the already overwhelming burdens of the Finance Committee, that it is impracticable, if the Senate expects to pass a revenue bill before the 10th of June, to require the Finance Committee to do this work.

The Finance Committee has a very difficult task to perform in connection with the revision of the revenue law, and if it should be converted into an investigating committee it will be unable to perform the even more important function connected with the legislation now pending before the committee.

It is true that the results of the investigation which it is expected the special committee will conduct are to be enacted into law, and that in a sense it will be required that the Finance Committee familiarize itself with the work of the investigating committee; but, at the same time, I think the Senator from New York must see that if the Finance Committee is to be converted into an investigating body at this time there will be no legislation on the subject of revenue reform, there will be no tax reduction, which many of us hope may be speedily accomplished, and there will probably be no revision of the administrative features of the revenue law.

I thank the Senator from New York.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, the matter may seem of comparatively small importance, and I do not desire to press it unduly, but it occurs to me that the Finance Committee, in the consideration of the revenue law, and especially those features which propose changes in the administrative features of the law, will have to conduct some kind of an investigation in order to ascertain whether those proposed changes are wise or should themselves be changed or amended. In order to get that information, the Finance Committee itself will have to inquire at some length, at least, into the method of operating the Bureau of Internal Revenue in connection with the income tax.

As I recollect, there are 17 Senators on the Finance Committee, and while I do not desire to give advice unasked and uncalled for to a committee of which I am not a member, my thought was that this work could be done by a subcommittee of the Finance Committee working along in cooperation with the full committee as it considered the revenue bill. But this resolution provides for a separate and distinct committee, and we have no assurance that this separate and distinct committee, meeting in another room, under a different chairman, and at different times, composed of Senators not members of the Finance Committee, will cooperate with the Finance Committee itself. It seems to me that the membership of the Finance Committee, amounting to 17, would be competent to do this work without the creation of a separate committee.

Mr. ROBINSON obtained the floor.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield.

Mr. COUZENS. I merely want to say that the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] three months ago introduced a resolution substantially the same as the resolution now before the Senate. That resolution has been before the Committee on Finance for three months, and during all that time no attempt has been made to investigate the administrative features or any other feature of the Bureau of Internal Revenue. I submit, Mr. President, that if the Committee on Finance, with a resolution before it for three months, took no action, it was evidently not thought by that committee that it was desirable to inquire into the administrative features of the Internal Revenue Bureau.

I submit that if they thought it was not desirable and some other section of the Senate thought it was desirable the Senate has a right to determine whether an inquiry into this bureau is desirable.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, the Finance Committee must think that such an investigation is desirable, or they would not have reported this resolution.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, the Finance Committee reported this resolution, as just stated by the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH], providing for the investigation by a special committee, which shows conclusively that the Finance Committee itself does not desire to undertake the task at this time. It is well known to all of us that there inhere in the law itself difficulties of construction and interpretation which have given rise to confusion in the administration of the income tax law. That confusion has been at times so great that it has been exceedingly difficult for a taxpayer who in good faith desires to discharge his duty to the Government to ascertain what is his obligation.

There comes to my memory now instances where taxpayers have had the greatest difficulty of finding out what taxes are chargeable to them under the law as construed by the authorities in the Internal Revenue Bureau. In my judgment, the confusion is not entirely due to conflict of opinion among the agents of the bureau. It is due in part to the language of the law itself. If any Senator will take the present income tax law and read it, and then intelligently construe any one of six sections of the statute that I can point out, he will earn renown as a lawyer of exceptional and discriminating powers.

Congress ought speedily to simplify the language of our revenue law. I realize that under the practice which prevails, and which must be continued, the tax laws of the Government in the first instance are suggested by experts, and quite naturally they are disposed to employ language which to them usually has a definite meaning, but which requires knowledge of other statutes and of the constructions placed upon those statutes, not alone by courts but by officers of the Bureau of Internal Revenue. On this account great confusion has arisen.

As the resolution was first presented, statements were made in the preamble which indicated that there has been unnecessary delay in the decisions of income-tax cases; that this delay has been characterized by inefficiency on the part of the bureau or its agents; that in instances fraudulent and corrupt practices have occurred, and that before necessary reforms can be accomplished those alleged abuses should be ascertained and disclosed.

The resolution as reported by the committee eliminates the provisions of the preamble, but the resolution itself is broad enough to enable the committee to make any investigation the circumstances indicate may be necessary. The resolution is all comprehensive, and if the investigation is to be of value it will require very careful labor on the part of the members of the special committee who are to make that investigation, and their work can not be completed within a few days or a few weeks. The task is going to prove a very difficult one, because it involves a revision of language which has come, in the minds of experts, to have a definite meaning, but which, when read by one possessing only ordinary knowledge of the English language, has little, if any, meaning.

It is regrettable that the investigation was not undertaken some time ago, so that the Committee on Finance might have the benefit of the conclusions of the committee in the preparation of the bill for tax reform which it is expected will be reported and passed during the present session.

No more important subject is before the Congress than the subject of tax reduction. Yesterday the President sent to the Congress a special message in which he indicated disappointment that a measure providing for a 25 per cent reduction in taxes to be collected for the calendar year 1923 has not already been passed. I do not know why the President waited until just four days before the expiration of the time in which taxpayers are required to file their tax returns for the calendar year 1923 to make this recommendation. It has been known by the Congress and the country for a long time that no possibility exists of passing the general tax reduction law so as to make its provisions effective prior to March 15 of the present year.

Several months ago, early in the present session, in the body at the other end of the Capitol, the ranking member of the Ways and Means Committee, Mr. GARNER of Texas, made a proposal that relief from the tax burdens of 1923 and general legislation respecting tax reduction be separated. Six weeks ago he asked unanimous consent for the consideration of an appropriate joint resolution. We all know that bills raising revenue must originate in the House of Representatives. They can not originate in the Senate of the United States.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SPENCER in the chair). Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I would like to have the Senator's opinion as to whether a bill or resolution reducing revenue might not constitutionally originate in the Senate.

Mr. ROBINSON. Oh, no; certainly not. Within the meaning of the constitutional provision which I have quoted any bill providing for the collection of revenue is a bill raising revenue.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Such a bill or resolution as the Senator suggests would provide that revenue be not raised in part. I would suggest to the Senator that the word "raising" means "levying" revenue.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, the proposition of the Senator from Pennsylvania when analyzed is that any bill which reduces the amount of revenue to be raised is not a bill raising revenue and, therefore, can originate in the Senate of the United States. If the suggestion came from a less respectable source I would not take the trouble to discuss it. Clearly the meaning of the constitutional provision is that the House of Representatives must initiate revenue legislation, and that means legislation which increases taxes and also means legislation which diminishes taxes. At the time that constitutional provision was adopted the Members of the House of Representatives were selected by popular vote and the Members of the Senate were selected by the legislatures of the respective States which they were chosen to represent. The object of the framers of the Constitution was to protect the public against recklessness in the matter of revenue legislation.

It is usually just as necessary to enact a revenue measure that will raise adequate revenue to meet the expenses of the Government as it is to protect the public against extortionate tax levies which will produce more revenue than is required. Months ago, in the only body that could originate such legislation, the leader of the Democrats on the Ways and Means Committee urged the course suggested by the President's special message of yesterday, and his suggestion was treated with contempt, was rejected by the leaders of the President's party, and rejected by the President himself.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President——

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. COPELAND. Does the Senator recall that I submitted in January a resolution asking that information be had from the Secretary of the Treasury as to whether there might not be a percentage reduction of the taxes of 1923?

Mr. ROBINSON. I recall that very distinctly. The Senator from New York did me the honor to consult with me before he presented the resolution. No action whatever was taken respecting it, but, of course, the question would naturally arise whether the Senate would be within its jurisdiction if it undertook to consider and dispose of such a resolution.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President——

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. BROOKHART. In the last Congress how much were the upper brackets of taxes reduced?

Mr. ROBINSON. They were reduced from 65 to 50 per cent maximum.

Mr. BROOKHART. How much were the lower brackets reduced?

Mr. ROBINSON. I do not recall the exact percentage. The Senator may state it if he desires to do so.

Mr. BROOKHART. I do not remember it exactly myself. It was a very small percentage, however.

Mr. ROBINSON. No; the percentage of reduction was substantial, if I remember it.

Mr. BROOKHART. Then the excess-profits taxes were reduced amounting to nearly $500,000,000.

Mr. ROBINSON. Yes; but I do not consider that germane to the proposition I am now discussing.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I think the Senator can state very safely that when the reduction of 1921 was made, the percentage of reduction on the higher incomes was greater than on the lower.

Mr. ROBINSON. No; I think the percentages were not greater. The reduction, however, was very great, and that is the important feature of the interrogation of the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. BROOKHART. The point I am making is that the horizontal reduction demanded now is more favorable to the upper brackets than is the bill which was just passed by the House, and less favorable to the lower brackets.

Mr. ROBINSON. The bill that passed the House contained what is known as the Longworth compromise levying a maximum of 37½ per cent, which would be a reduction by about 25 per cent, so that the proposal to reduce by 25 per cent would conform to the Longworth compromise.

Mr. BROOKHART. Then what would be the effect of the compromise on the lower brackets? It would raise them.

Mr. ROBINSON. A reduction of 25 per cent raise them? Oh, no; certainly not.

Mr. BROOKHART. I mean it would raise them compared to the bill that has just passed the House.

Mr. ROBINSON. The reduction in the lower brackets, according to the Garner plan, is greater than 25 per cent in many instances.

Mr. BROOKHART. Then the real effect of the present proposition is to raise the taxes in the lower brackets——

Mr. ROBINSON. Oh, no.

Mr. BROOKHART. Compared with the——

Mr. ROBINSON. I do not think that is an accurate statement at all. If the Senator will pardon me I can state the effect of it. Compared to the Longworth compromise, the effect of the President's proposal is identical, and his proposal is a smaller reduction than that contemplated by the Garner plan on the number of the lower brackets.

Mr. BROOKHART. I think the Senator did not understand what I meant. I mean by that as compared with the bill which has just passed the House the 25 per cent proposition would raise the lower brackets.

Mr. SMOOT. No. The Senator is mistaken. As it actually passed the House——

Mr. ROBINSON. As I understand what passed the House, that body incorporated in the bill the provision for a 25 per cent reduction. Will the Senator from Iowa give me his attention?

Mr. BROOKHART. Certainly.

Mr. ROBINSON. The bill as it passed the House incorporated a provision identical with the suggestion of the President, in so far as it relates to taxes for the calendar year 1923; that is, the Longworth compromise. The Garner plan also included a 25 per cent reduction upon all income taxes paid or to be collected for the year 1923; so that there is no distinction in the bill as it passed the House of Representatives either as to the higher brackets or the lower brackets for the year 1923.

Mr. BROOKHART. I think that explains it quite fully.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield.

Mr. GLASS. What has the Senator to say to this suggestion? In theory taxation is not only an imposition directly upon the taxpayers, but it is an imposition upon consumption; that is to say, every taxpayer who can, and most of them can, includes his taxes in his overhead charges and collects them from the consumer. Now, it is suggested that the proposed 25 per cent rebate has already been collected from the consumer, and that the rebate simply amounts to an additional bounty to the taxpayer.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I hold that the collection as taxes in any amount not necessary to meet the expenses of government when honestly and economically administered is an abuse of power, and if no deficit will arise by a reduction of taxes to be made effective for the calendar year 1923, it is our duty to make the reduction.

Mr. SMOOT. There is a provision for that purpose in the bill as it passed the House.

Mr. ROBINSON. As an economic principle it is true that some classes of taxes are passed on to the consumer. I think generally when it can be done a taxpayer will reimburse himself for his contribution to the expenses of the Government. It seems to me, however, that this particular class of tax—the income tax—is more difficult to pass on to the consumer than almost any other form of tax.

In some instances, as just suggested by my friend the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS], it can not be done. In other instances perhaps it is done. But I would not let the fact that a part of the taxes for the year 1923 may have been passed on to the consumer prevent me from supporting a proposal to reduce taxes for that year, because we must begin some time, and if we are collecting 25 per cent more taxes than needed for the honest and economical expenditures of the Government we ought promptly to cut off that burden.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President——

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. BROOKHART. Is there any portion of the public debt to which that could be applied if collected?

Mr. ROBINSON. Oh, I think so. I think if we chose to pursue that course, if it should be deemed wise to apply the revenues in a larger amount to the payment of the public debt, we could not only use any surplus that will arise under the present law but we could use a far greater sum. I do feel, however, Mr. President, that there is a general demand in the United States for tax reduction, and I believe Congress ought to respect that demand in so far as it can do so without impairing either the credit or the efficiency of the Government.

Mr. BROOKHART. In view of the suggestion of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] that this tax has already been paid by the consumers and would not go back to them, it seems to me that this year it should be applied to the public debt.

Mr. ROBINSON. As I have already stated, I do not think the suggestion of the Senator from Virginia can be carried to the conclusion that the income taxes for 1923 have already been paid by the consumers. I do not think that sound principles of economics sustain that conclusion. There may be some instances in which it has been done.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President——

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield to the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. EDGE. Admitting, as I understand the Senator from Arkansas to do, that the taxpayer is entitled to this rebate, does the Senator not think it would be more businesslike—and I do not rise in a spirit of controversy at all—if the rebate were granted, if necessary under the Constitution, by the initiation of the House of Representatives in a separate act and the taxpayers not be compelled to await the final disposition of the general revenue revision legislation? If the rebate be included in that revision, as I understand to be the intention, it would involve a very laborious system of bookkeeping and rebates to hundreds of thousands of taxpayers who will in the meantime have paid their 25 per cent quota. If we can, in the interest of good business, encourage the passage of a separate act allowing this rebate, is it not our duty to do so?

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I began my remarks with an expression of disappointment at the failure of the present administration to take that course. I pointed out the fact that the ranking member of the Ways and Means Committee in the House of Representatives, which committee has jurisdiction of that legislation, suggested that course at the beginning of this session; indeed, that he urged it, but that his suggestion was rejected.

Mr. EDGE. Permit me to say that I did not hear the opening remarks of the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. ROBINSON. Now, Mr. President——

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, before the Senator from Arkansas proceeds, may I inquire what became of the resolution which was offered by the Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND] to which the Senator from Arkansas has referred?

Mr. ROBINSON. No action was taken upon it.

Mr. FLETCHER. Was the resolution referred to the Committee on Finance or was it adopted by the Senate?

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President——

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, on the 24th of January last I introduced Senate Resolution 132, suggesting that the Secretary of the Treasury had reported a surplus of $300,000,000 and that he believed a material reduction in the income taxes might take place. So the resolution resolved—

> That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to present to the Congress some plan of percentage deduction from the returns to be filed March 15, 1924, so that the overburdened taxpayers of the United States may benefit immediately by the improved state of the Nation's finances.

That resolution was submitted seven weeks ago. The Secretary of the Treasury then had his attention called to the matter, and I say that the administration is very culpable in that it has not provided long before this some measure of relief.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, the resolution just referred to by the Senator from New York was on the 24th day of January referred to the Committee on Finance. Clearly it has been the policy of the administration not to take any action for the relief of taxpayers for the year 1923 separate and apart from the general tax reduction bill. Within three or four days of the end of the time when returns may be filed by individuals for the income taxes of 1923 the President sends Congress a message urging the passage of legislation relieving from 25 per cent of the taxes for that year. The President's message comes at a time when a large majority of the returns in number have already been filed. It comes also when everyone in Congress knows—and I take it that the President himself must have known—that there was not the slightest possibility of the legislation passing. He waited until it became known that it could not be passed for lack of time, and then sent the message to the Congress. Why was that course pursued by the President? It would be interesting to know why he has waited so long and how far political considerations prompted the message which he sent to Congress yesterday.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Mr. President——

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Does not the Senator from Arkansas recognize the fact that the President has had many Cabinet difficulties to deal with and that no human being could be expected to look after that character of trouble and at the same time think about the mere matter of tax reduction?

Mr. ROBINSON. Undoubtedly the President has been very busy. The subject of tax reduction and tax reform, however, was brought forward at the beginning of the present session of Congress. The issue was attempted to be made by the leader of the Democrats in the House of Representatives and legislation for immediate relief was urged, but the President took no interest in the matter; he made no recommendation concerning it until it had become too late for anything to be accomplished. Then he modestly expressed his disappointment that nothing had been done.

Mr. McKELLAR and Mr. JONES of New Mexico addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield; and if so to, whom?

Mr. ROBINSON. I first yield to the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR], who first rose.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I noticed in the Washington Evening Star of March the 10th, two days ago, what might be an answer to the Senator's question. The article is written by Mr. Frederick William Wile, and is headed thus:

> Congress' inaction is irking Coolidge. Three months pass without any of 58 proposals in message enacted.

It may be that since Congress has not passed any of the President's recommendations into law, if this article is correct——

Mr. ROBINSON. That the President thought he would make some more and some new ones.

Mr. McKELLAR. That the President thought he would add a new one that Congress could pass.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, the point I am making is that the President never made the recommendation at a time when it could have been considered and acted upon; that he withheld his recommendation until everyone knows it is too late to secure action; and the only result of it is political advantage.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President——

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield to the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I quite agree with the statement which the Senator has made that the great majority of the income-tax payers have already made their returns; I think that is unquestionably true; but the passage of the bill even at this late date would, in my judgment, relieve a few. As I understand the history of the payment of the income taxes, the very large taxpayers defer the making of their returns and the payment of their taxes to the very last moment. They consider the interest upon the amount which they would have to pay as a daily matter. So I presume that a few very large taxpayers would be benefited by the passage of the resolution recommended by the President.

Mr. ROBINSON. They certainly have not been encouraged to go ahead and pay their taxes promptly by the special message of the President. If it has had any effect at all, it has had the effect to encourage the class of taxpayers referred to by the Senator from New Mexico to delay making their returns and delay paying the first installment upon their taxes.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, may I suggest to the Senator that perhaps the President does not favor the revenue bill as it has come to this body from the other, and he fears that the provision calling for a 25 per cent reduction may not become a law, the reason being that the reduction of taxes on incomes of $200,000 and above is considerably less than that recommended by the Secretary of the Treasury, while the reduction of the normal tax rate on incomes of $8,000 and under is considerably more than was recommended in the Mellon plan. So this difference may impress the President unfavorably, and he may feel that probably he will not sign the bill.

Mr. ROBINSON. In other words, the suggestion of the Senator from Florida is that if a separate resolution reducing the taxes for 1923 by 25 per cent should be passed the President might find himself with a freer hand to veto the general tax reduction bill unless it conforms strictly to the Mellon plan?

Mr. FLETCHER. Yes.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President——

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield now to the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. EDGE. I merely wish to say a word. Considerable stress has been laid on the resolution offered by the Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND] asking for information as to what plan could be availed of to take advantage of the saving in governmental expenditures in 1922 and 1923 by way of a reduction in taxes for 1923. I have just looked at a copy of his resolution, and he seems to answer his question in his resolution. I can not see why there should have been any action or why the resolution was necessary, for in the preamble of the resolution it is stated:

Whereas the Secretary of the Treasury states that the fiscal years 1922 and 1923 have each closed with a surplus in excess of $300,000,000—

And so forth. Then the resolution itself directs the Secretary to present some plan under which that saving can be applied to the taxpayers or taken advantage of by them. The mere fact that it is evident a surplus is in the Treasury has apparently inspired different Members of the House of Representatives—I do not recall who—to introduce the perfectly obvious type of legislation to reduce, from a retroactive standpoint, the taxes in that proportion. It seems to me that there is nothing more about which it is necessary for the Senator from New York to be informed.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator from New Jersey may characterize a proposition as a perfectly obvious type of legislation, but evidently the legislation proposing a reduction of taxes in 1923 is not so obvious that the Secretary of the Treasury has been able to see it and the President of the United States was not able to see it in time to secure action prior to March 15.

Mr. COPELAND and Mr. PEPPER addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield, first, to the Senator from New York.

Mr. COPELAND. It is not so obvious to the people who are required to pay the 25 per cent which they might have saved had the Republicans taken advantage of the opportunity to present the bill at the right time.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield with pleasure.

Mr. PEPPER. The Senator has not made it quite clear to me why immediate action might not have been taken by the House of Representatives upon the President's suggestion. If I understand the Senator correctly, the President's proposal is identical with one provision in a bill which has already passed the House. One would suppose that the House might easily and forthwith have taken the action suggested by the President.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I understand the Senator's question perfectly and it is a very proper question, but I will state to the Senator that in the language attributed by the newspapers to the gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. TREADWAY, a majority member of the Ways and Means Committee, there are a number of members of that committee who are unwilling to assent to the proposition contained in the President's special message of yesterday, who are not desirous of seeing the question as to a reduction of taxes for the calendar year 1923 separated from the Longworth proposal; and my information is that the latter gentleman himself, the leader of the majority of the House of Representatives, has announced that he will not consent to the consideration of a separate resolution, which, of course, makes it impossible for such a proposal as that contained in the President's special message to be acted on prior to March 15.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, we all saw that the House did not act, and we all assumed that there was some reason for their failure to act. The point of my question was to bring out what I understand now to be the concession of the Senator from Arkansas, that so far as the President is concerned the suggestion was not only a proper and timely one but it might have been complied with if the legislative body had chosen to do so.

Mr. ROBINSON. No, Mr. President; it would not be possible under the ordinary procedure of the two Houses to pass a measure of that importance within four days. It never has been done. Such measures are never enacted, as a rule, by unanimous consent; and, as the President realizes and the Senator from Pennsylvania must realize, unanimous consent would have to be given in both Houses of Congress for the consideration of a joint resolution or a bill putting into effect a 25 per cent reduction of the taxes for 1923. That consent could not be secured for the reason, as stated by the gentleman whose name I called a few moments ago, a majority member of the Ways and Means Committee, that several members of that committee would not assent to the consideration of the joint resolution; and the understanding is also that the majority leader himself is opposed to the proposition. I think it is not trespassing upon the proprieties of this occasion to say that the reason for it is that the majority leadership in the House of Representatives does not want to leave the President with a free hand to veto the Longworth compromise in the event it passes the Senate, and they fear that he would feel freer to do so if the Congress had already passed a measure relieving the taxpayer from 25 per cent of the taxes for the present year.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, the facts to which the Senator has adverted are not known to me, and I have no opinion respecting them; but I merely wish to observe that what the President of the United States has done is to ask the unanimous consent of both Houses of Congress to the immediate reduction of the taxes for 1923 in accordance with the provision which has already met the approval of the majority of the Members of the House of Representatives and which, no doubt, in due course will receive the support of the Senate. That is the proposition that the President made; and how it can be doubted that the President may with propriety ask unanimous consent for so obviously popular a measure is something which I, for one, fail to understand.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I rise merely to say that the Longworth compromise did not pass the House of Representatives by a unanimous vote. There was a close division. It barely passed at all, and it is unreasonable to expect the acceptance of a portion of the bill by unanimous vote. This morning's paper contains a statement by a distinguished majority member of the Ways and Means Committee that unanimous consent can not possibly be secured, and press reports have heretofore announced that unanimous consent can not be secured because of objection on the part of other majority members, probably including the leader of the majority, Mr. LONGWORTH.

Mr. PEPPER. Very well, Mr. President; but the fact remains that the President of the United States has said merely this, and he has said it so sensibly and plainly that everybody will understand it. He has said to the House: "You have thrashed out your revenue bill. It is true that by a narrow majority the bill has been passed, but it has been passed. It has in it a feature which now represents the action of the House. Make it unanimous in the interest of the people of the United States, and do it before it is too late." That is what he wants.

Mr. COPELAND obtained the floor.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JONES of Washington in the chair). Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON. If the President had seen fit to make his recommendation 30 or 60 days ago, or at the time when Representative GARNER urged it, there would have been no necessity for obtaining unanimous consent, which anyone must know would be difficult, if not impossible. The measure could have been considered and passed upon its own merits.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, it seems to any casual observer that the request at this late day for the unanimous passage of a joint resolution dealing with this matter is placed before us for political effect; but, regardless of what effect it may have politically, I am here to say that so far as my constituents are concerned they want this reduction. The demand of my State is in favor of it. Seventy-five million dollars will be saved to the people of New York if this joint resolution prevails. I think I speak for the Senators on this side of the Chamber when I say that so far as we are concerned we favor the reduction. If unanimous consent is asked for, certainly, so far as I am concerned, I shall give that consent.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the Senator is speaking about a joint resolution that has been offered, is he?

Mr. COPELAND. I am speaking about the suggestion by the President of the United States of the passage of a joint resolution permitting a 25 per cent reduction on the 1923 returns. I think we ought not to permit the day to pass without putting through such a measure as this, if it is possible to put it through, because the people are demanding that there shall be this immediate reduction.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. COPELAND. I do.

Mr. McKELLAR. I agree with the Senator that the people of the country are most insistent for, and they are entitled to have, a reduction of taxes. I think that is the unanimous view of the people of the State I represent and the view of the people of this country generally. However, this request of the President comes in here so late that I do not see how it is possible for it to be done now; but that, I will say to the Senator, is no reason why it may not be done. Only the first installment is payable on the 15th of March, and there is no reason in the world why this measure can not be passed anyway and the taxpayers get the advantage of it. It will make a reduction of 25 per cent in the total tax for the year and may be credited on subsequent quarterly payments of the tax, and I want to say that I am very much in favor of it. I shall vote for it whenever it comes up, and even if it were to come up now as a unanimous-consent proposition I should not object to it. Of course, it will have to be initiated in the House first, under the constitutional provision that all bills for raising revenue must originate in the House of Representatives. Tax reduction must be had. It is the most important question before the Congress. I shall leave no steps untaken to secure tax reduction at the earliest possible moment. Our Republican friends are in charge of the Government. The proposition is primarily up to them.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator if he ever tried to get a refund from the Government? It will take about three years and eight months to get it.

Mr. McKELLAR. I agree with the Senator about that; but this legislation granting a reduction of 25 per cent need not be in the way of a refund. It can simply be taken out of the taxpayers' next installment of taxes, and no doubt some such arrangement will be made. I can not see that there is the slightest doubt but that it will be made. It is just a question of how it shall be made and how quickly it shall be made.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. COPELAND. I do.

Mr. GLASS. I should like either the Senator from Tennessee or the Senator from New York to tell us how we may immediately act here. I have understood that revenue measures had to originate in the House.

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. McKELLAR. That is entirely true.

Mr. GLASS. How can the Senate proceed now to reduce taxes?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Section 7 of the first article of the Constitution of the United States provides that—

> All bills for raising revenue shall originate in the House of Representatives.

I do not mean to make any play on the word "raising" as it is used in that sentence. I see, and I thought everybody saw, that the purpose of the Constitution was to protect the people against the imposition of excessive taxation by requiring that all bills for the levying or the raising of taxes should originate in the most numerous branch of the National Legislature. I do not concede, however, that it is unconstitutional, and until the Senator from Arkansas so scornfully rejected my suggestion in a way that the Supreme Court does not, in a way that I do not know that lawyers ordinarily do about undecided questions of constitutional law, it seemed to me entirely constitutional for the Senate to originate a measure which relieved the people of tax burdens, because the whole purpose of the constitutional provision is to protect the people from additional levies or excessive levies or the increase of present levies, and it certainly is not to protect the people against a reduction of present burdens. That is why I think it is a very serious question for all lawyers, except perhaps the Senator from Arkansas, whether the Senate has not the right to originate a repealer of a revenue law, or such a resolution repealing in part the present revenue law as is now suggested.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON. I do not think I am justified in reviewing this subject again. I want a vote to occur on the resolution prior to 2 o'clock, if possible; but I will state to the Senator from Pennsylvania that my understanding of the interpretation of that provision of the Constitution is that all revenue bills, whether they increase the amount of revenue or diminish it, must originate in the House of Representatives, and that the word "raise" has no relation whatever to an increase or a diminution in taxation. It relates to measures for the procuring of revenue. Any measure which provides or affects revenue, whether it increases it or diminishes it, is a measure for raising revenue within the constitutional meaning; and the Supreme Court, I think, has uniformly sustained that conclusion. In other words, it would not be competent for the Senate to entertain in the first instance a bill providing for a reduction by 25 per cent of the revenues now collected, because that is a bill raising revenue within the meaning of the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. COPELAND. I do.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. If the argument of the Senator from Pennsylvania is correct, it would be possible, then, to originate a sweeping tariff reduction bill in the Senate.

Mr. ROBINSON. Certainly.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Such a thing was never heard of before.

Mr. ROBINSON. Certainly; it has never even been attempted.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, does the Senator claim that the Supreme Court has ever decided that it may not be done?

Mr. ROBINSON. The construction has been unanimous, as far as I know. It certainly has not been attempted during the last 20 years in the Congress of the United States. The uniform construction is that any measure which affects the revenue is a bill for raising revenue within the meaning of the constitutional provision.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I will concede to the Senator that any bill that imposed a reduced tax would be a bill for raising revenue; but a repealer of a tax law, or a repealer in part, would not be, in my judgment, within the meaning of the Constitution.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, the proposal to reduce the present taxes by 25 per cent under the Senator's own definition now would be a bill for raising revenue; and the Senate, as I stated in the beginning, could not take jurisdiction of it, even under the Senator's own conclusion.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I should like to ask the chairman of the Finance Committee if he agrees with the view of the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I think the best way to answer the question is to say that if a revenue bill of any kind or nature did originate in the Senate, and if the Senate did pass it, it would go to the House of Representatives, and I do not think the House would ever take any notice of it.

Mr. ROBINSON. It would not even receive it. It would send it back.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield to the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. SWANSON. There has been a precedent on it in the last four or five years, when the naval bill was up. A provision for the sale of bonds, which is a method of raising revenue, was put on as an amendment here, to take care of certain additions that were made to the naval bill. The House of Representatives unanimously refused to consider it, and sent it back, and said that it was an infringement of their rights and that it would have to come back to the Senate and that provision would have to be eliminated before they would consider the whole bill.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I think they were exactly right in that; but that was not a bill to repeal a revenue law.

Mr. SWANSON. Getting revenue in any shape or form. There is a way the Senator can accomplish his purpose which, I have no doubt, would be in accord with what the President desires in making this recommendation. The Senator can move to strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill which originated in the House and substitute his resolution, and it will go over to the House and they can concur in it. That would result in the death of the provisions of that bill, except for the provision put in here. I have no doubt that is what the President desires to have done.

Mr. ROBINSON. That can not be done before the 15th of March.

Mr. SWANSON. No; but that is the only way in which it can be accomplished by the Senate; and I have no doubt that would carry out the purpose of the President to kill the bill and get the 25 per cent reduction through.

Mr. McKELLAR. Will the Senator from New York yield?
Mr. COPELAND. I yield.
Mr. McKELLAR. The Senate may recall that just a few days ago a District bill was presented which provided, among other things, for the placing of a small tax on gasoline. The Chair ruled that that being a District bill it did not come within the provisions of the Constitution about all revenue bills originating in the House. An appeal to the Senate was taken; and the Senate held, by quite a large majority, that the Chair was in error, and that even a bill of that kind had to originate in the House. I have no doubt in the world that a bill for tax reduction will have to originate in the House.
Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, as a final word, it is the fault of the gentlemen across the aisle that this provision for a reduction in the taxes of 1923 has not been made; and if they think it should originate in the House, I suggest that they ask their Republican colleagues in the House to make every effort to have it passed and send it back to us so that we can pass it this afternoon or to-morrow.
Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I simply desire to make a few observations with reference to the matters under discussion. First, with reference to the contention of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED]. An act to materially amend or repeal an act to raise revenue would interfere just as much with the initiatory powers of the House over the subject of raising revenue as would a direct measure on the part of the Senate to raise revenue. The Senator is clearly, I think, wrong in his contention for the contrary view.
I do not think it has ever been maintained in this Chamber that we have any more right to repeal a law passed for the purpose of raising revenue to support the Government than we have to originate such legislation.
I have never heard it contended since I have been here that we had any such power. I know that many resolutions, and possibly bills, have been introduced during the period of my service here which it was supposed would affect the revenues, and invariably the constitutional objection to this body's initiating such legislation has been made and acknowledged. I think it has been definitely settled that we have not that power.
I have said this because the Senator from New York, who introduced a resolution with reference to revenues of the Government, seems to be under the impression that we might to-day take up his resolution and pass it, or some resolution which would carry out the purposes of the President in the message which he delivered to us yesterday. We have not the power to do it, and the House of Representatives has indicated that at this late hour it does not intend to do it. It seems to me that should be an end to the matter.
Of course, we are all in favor of the reduction of taxes. Any statement to the contrary that this side of the Chamber is not in full sympathy with every movement that is now under way for the reduction of taxes is without warrant. The only difference between us at any time has been as to the plan of reduction. We are not only all in favor of reducing taxes that are to be hereafter paid, but we are all in favor of making the reduction retroactive so as to include the incomes of 1923.
The Senator from New York, however, is entitled to the honor and the distinction of having been the first man in either House of Congress to suggest the idea of extending these reductions to the incomes of 1923.
The distinguished ranking member of the minority of the Ways and Means Committee of the House some time ago, subsequent, however, to the introduction of the resolution by the Senator from New York, advanced the same proposition, and I think offered a resolution to that end either in the House or in the Ways and Means Committee. Instead of reporting out a resolution and speeding it through Congress the proposition was adopted and written in the bill. Why this course? Doubtless because that committee thought that wisdom required that this reduction of the taxes of 1923 should be coupled with the reductions of taxes hereafter to be paid. If we should separate these two propositions and pass legislation for the relief of the taxpayers of 1923, and the proposed bill reducing taxes hereafter to be paid should fail, the result would have been a distinct discrimination in favor of the taxpayers of one particular year. For that, and probably for some other reasons, it was determined in the House of Representatives that these two propositions should not be separated, and the very identical proposition contained in the resolution which the President now asks us to pass by unanimous consent is, as I said, written in the bill which is now pending before the Finance Committee.
If that bill becomes law and the taxpayers of the future are to be relieved, then the taxpayers of the past year will be relieved. If that bill does not pass and the taxpayers of the future are not to be relieved, then the taxpayers of last year ought not to be relieved. The two things ought to be coupled together. It was a wise solution on the part of the framers of revenue legislation in the other body.
The only reason advanced as to why this resolution should be railroaded through Congress at this time is that if that is not done, and the same object is accomplished through the passage of the bill now pending, it will create inconvenience in the Treasury Department, entail extra bookkeeping, and involve complications in accounting.
I do not wish to say that that is a pretext. I do not wish to say that there is some ulterior consideration not now disclosed.
As it is nearly 2 o'clock, it is suggested to me that I yield so that a vote may be taken on the pending resolution before the expiration of the morning hour. I yield for that purpose.
The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the pending question on the resolution.
The READING CLERK. The Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate report to strike out all after the word "Resolved" and insert:

That the President of the Senate pro tempore is authorized to appoint a special committee of five members, three of whom shall be of the majority and two of the minority party, which shall investigate the Bureau of Internal Revenue to ascertain the extent of which said conditions exist and report its findings together with recommendations for corrective legislation not later than May 1 (April 15, 1924), so that this information may be ready for the Senate in considering the pending tax revision and tax reduction bill.

The committee is authorized to hold hearings, to sit during the sessions and recesses of the Sixty-eighth Congress and to employ a stenographer at a cost not to exceed 25 cents per hundred words. The committee is further authorized to send for persons and papers; to require by subpœna the attendance of witnesses, the production of books, papers, and documents; to administer oaths; and to take testimony. The expenses of the committee shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate.

The Committee on Finance report amendments to the amendment of the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate as follows: After the words "pro tempore," on page 3, line 1, insert the words "or acting President of the Senate pro tempore."
The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.
The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.
The READING CLERK. Also on page 3, line 6, after the word "Revenue," the Committee on Finance report to strike out the words "to ascertain the extent of which said conditions exist."
The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.
The READING CLERK. On page 4, line 2, after the word "legislation," the Committee on Finance report to strike out the words "not later than April 15, 1924, so that this information may be ready for the Senate in considering the pending tax revision and tax reduction bills."
The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.
The amendment as amended was agreed to.
The resolution as amended was agreed to.
The READING CLERK. The Committee on Finance report to strike out the preamble.
The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment striking out the preamble.
The amendment was agreed to.
The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CURTIS in the chair). The Chair appoints as the committee the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON], the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. ERNST], the Senator from Michigan [Mr. COUZENS], the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. JONES], and the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING].
The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

AGRICULTURAL DIVERSIFICATION.

The READING CLERK. A bill (S. 2250) to promote a permanent system of self-supporting agriculture in regions adversely affected by the stimulation of wheat production during the war and aggravated by many years of small yields and high-production costs of wheat.
Mr. SIMMONS. I say that if the resolution should pass to-day, only four days before the time for final filing of income tax returns and the payment of the first installment, the inconvenience, the dislocation, the extra bookkeeping and accounting which it is claimed would be imposed upon the Treasury Department if the resolution fails and such a provision incorporated in the law, would be practically just as great or, at least, nearly so.

There must be some other reason why the administration is so anxious to have the resolution passed right upon the eve of the day fixed for the final filing of these tax returns. I do not say what these reasons are, but I speculate and conjecture. It has been suggested that if the resolution is permitted to pass the administration will probably find an issue upon which to go before the people even if the bill itself should ultimately be defeated or vetoed.

It has also been suggested—I do not assert it—that if the resolution is passed and the administration shall get credit with the country for making a reduction in the taxes of 1923, the President could with greater impunity veto the bill, as there has been threats he would do, unless both Houses of Congress should surrender their judgment and right of decision and accept the bill which the administration has prepared and sent to us without change or emendation.

I do not know what the purposes of the President with regard to the matter are, but I do know that the Republican Party is in a dilemma about the bill. If either the Garner or Longworth plan is adopted and the bill is passed and the President shall veto it, then the Republican Party will have to account with the overwhelming sentiment for reduction in the country. If the President shall succeed in forcing the adoption of the Mellon plan and signs the bill, the President and the Republican Party will have to account to the great mass of American voters for the rank discrimination made in that plan in favor of the man of big income and against the man of small income. Again, Mr. President, that the Republican Party, as represented by the administration, may feel that certain Senators may be reluctant upon the eve of the election to vote for the drastic provisions of the Mellon plan, to vote for a reduction of 50 per cent upon the taxes of men of large incomes in the country and only 25 per cent upon the taxes of men of small incomes. I can see how they may be afraid to cast that kind of a vote upon the eve of the election. It is conceivable that the administration, much as it may favor that plan, might see danger in it on election day. It is conceivable that even some Republican Senators and Representatives may tremble at the thought of having to answer so soon at the bar of public opinion for such a vote as that. I can see how, under these circumstances, the die-hard advocates of the Mellon plan might conclude that if the bill could be postponed until after the election, all of these fears would be measurably quieted, and that the adoption of the Mellon plan might be successful in the next session of the Congress.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator on the amendment has expired. We are under the 10-minute rule. The Senator has 10 minutes on the bill, if he has not previously spoken on the bill.

Mr. SIMMONS. I was not speaking on the bill. However, I recognize the fact that the unfinished business is before the Senate.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The principal clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Fess	McKellar	Simmons
Bayard	Fletcher	McKinley	Smith
Borah	Frazier	McLean	Smoot
Brookhart	George	McNary	Spencer
Broussard	Gerry	Mayfield	Stanfield
Bruce	Glass	Moses	Stanley
Bursum	Gooding	Neely	Stephens
Cameron	Hale	Norris	Swanson
Capper	Harrison	Oddie	Trammell
Copeland	Howell	Pepper	Wadsworth
Couzens	Johnson, Minn.	Phipps	Walsh, Mass.
Curtis	Jones, Wash.	Ransdell	Walsh, Mont.
Dale	Kendrick	Reed, Mo.	Warren
Dill	Keyes	Reed, Pa.	Watson
Edge	King	Robinson	Weller
Edwards	Ladd	Sheppard	Willis
Ernst	Lodge	Shields
Ferris	McCormick	Shipstead

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MCNARY in the chair). Seventy Senators having answered to their names, there is a quorum present.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, commencing at 2 o'clock, the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] addressed the Senate on the amendment offered by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] to the pending bill. I imagine that the Senator from North Carolina did not know he was addressing the Senate upon that question, and certainly the Senate did not know he was discussing it. I propose for about a minute and a half to address myself to the same amendment, and I have an idea that the relevancy of my remarks will be about as apparent as were those of the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. President, I wish to congratulate the Senate on the appointment of a special select committee to investigate the Internal Revenue Bureau. Senators who are present may remember that I expressed the hope that the Committee on Finance could do this work. I was nearly deflected from my conviction upon that point by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], who, with sobs in his throat and tears streaming down his face, begged mercy for the Committee on Finance, describing how terribly overworked its members were, the huge dimensions of the task confronting them, and prophesying that it would take at least a month or more than a month for them to accomplish the single task connected with the revision of the revenue laws, and that no such additional burden as that contemplated by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. COUZENS] in his resolution should be imposed upon them. I say I was nearly deflected from my conviction in that regard by the impassioned plea of the Senator from Arkansas; and yet I find that the Presiding Officer of the Senate agreed with me in the long run, for when he appointed the committee of five he appointed four members of the Committee on Finance, and only one from outside the committee. So my point has been attained.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, the Senator from New York, of course, realizes that the Finance Committee can proceed with its important task of considering the revenue bill even while the subcommittee, of which four members of the Committee on Finance are members, proceed with the investigation of the Internal Revenue Bureau.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The Senator from New York suggested a subcommittee, and I am glad to see that the Presiding Officer has appointed a subcommittee of the Committee on Finance.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I assure the Senate that I am just as happy as is the Senator from New York.

PRESIDENT COOLIDGE'S RECOMMENDATIONS TO CONGRESS.

Mr. MCKELLAR. Mr. President, this morning reference was made to an article written by Frederick William Wile in the Washington Evening Star, with reference to the major recommendation submitted to the Congress by President Coolidge and the lack of action thereon by the Congress. I ask unanimous consent that the article may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CONGRESS'S INACTION IS IRKING COOLIDGE—THREE MONTHS PASS WITHOUT ANY OF 58 PROPOSALS IN MESSAGE ENACTED.

(By Frederick William Wile.)

Two cardinal purposes were in President Coolidge's mind Saturday night when he reminded the country at the White House Correspondents' Association dinner, that "Congress is supposed under the Constitution to be engaged with legislation."

In view of the prevailing national interest in "investigations," the President was unquestionably disposed, with that observation, to draw attention to Congress' feverish activity in fields which are not strictly within its constitutional jurisdiction. Mr. Coolidge, in effect, said that the legislative branch of the Government is usurping authority.

What the President, there is reason to believe, mainly desires to emphasize is the procrastination of Congress in dealing with matters of vital national importance. Senate and House have been in session for more than three months. Not even the annual appropriation bills have been passed.

NO PROPOSALS MADE LAW.

Not only has there been no action on those more or less routine measures, but no single one of the fifty-eight species of legislation recommended by President Coolidge in his message to Congress has as yet been enacted. These recommendations cover virtually every field of Federal activity and necessity. Each of them is of greater or lesser urgency.

Some of the President's friends and advisers believe he may shortly take occasion to talk more plainly to the country on the congressional situation than he did to the White House reporters. He is represented as desiring to give the investigation mania "rope enough to hang itself." When it has run its course and churned up all the dust and mud that the traffic will bear, there are Coolidge supporters who expect the President to speak up and speak out.

There has been circumstantial reports that before long Mr. Coolidge would do something to "electrify" the country. It has been foreshadowed that he has in contemplation, in his own time, action designed to show the country its confidence in him is not misplaced. The recent allusion to the constitutional rôle of Congress is now interpreted as indicating that the President, in a sort of way, means to turn the investigation tables and investigate what Congress has really been doing since December.

COOLIDGE'S MAJOR POLICIES.

Here is a tabulation of the major recommendations submitted to Congress by Coolidge in his maiden message:

1. Entry into the World Court.
2. Reorganization of the foreign service.
3. Tax reduction.
4. Abolition of tax-exempt securities.
5. Opening of intracoastal waterways.

36. Entire reconstruction of railroad-rate structure.
37. Legislation for railroad consolidation.
38. Revision of the laws of the United States.
39. Legislation permitting simplification of Supreme Court rules governing review by that tribunal.
40. Employment in Federal prisons.
41. New Federal reformatories.
42. Creation of division of criminal identification in Department of Justice.

CHARGE OF DO-NOTHINGISM.

Subdivision feature of these 42 presidential recommendations to Congress are said to bring up the grand total of specific legislative enactments proposed by Mr. Coolidge to 58. Bills have been introduced covering many of them. Hearings have been instituted in numerous instances. But no final action has as yet ensued. Coolidge adherents assert that the President could easily incite public indignation over such a program of demonstrated "do-nothingism" on Capitol Hill.

If Coolidge prefers to rebuke Congress for encroachment upon the Executive authority in calling for Cabinet resignations and investigating executive departments, instead of assailing Congress for time wasting, the President can call up a Mount Everest of precedent and proof to sustain his position. It began to accumulate in Andrew Jackson's administration. Another Democratic President, Grover Cleveland, piled it still higher. Cleveland's vigorous resentment of senatorial encroachment was the conspicuous feature of the many conflicts that raged during his first administration. Coolidge cited one of these—the Alabama district attorney episode—in his statement declaring he would ignore the Senate's demand for Denby's retirement.

DEFINES EXECUTIVE POWERS.

In the Law Journal of Georgetown University for November, 1923, two months before the pending congressional investigation epidemic broke out, Abraham F. Meyers, of the District of Columbia bar, discussed at length "The power of Congress to investigate the Executive."

Mr. Myers showed by a chain of precedents and Supreme Court decisions stretching from the Constitutional Convention at Philadelphia up to and including the late Chief Justiceship of Edward Douglass White that our Presidents and our highest tribunal have consistently maintained the independence of the Executive as against the interference of the legislative branch. In a passage that might have been prophetic with regard to current events Mr. Myers asserted:

> "The conclusion to be drawn from precedents and authorities hereinbefore cited is that neither Congress as a whole nor either House thereof is vested with any general supervisory power over the President. The head of an executive department may be regarded as an alter ego of the Chief Executive. The inquisitorial powers of Congress are strictly limited to subjects in regard to which it has a constitutional function to perform. Naturally, the enactment of legislation is the principal business of Congress. * * * The Executive is justified in resisting any demand when it is believed that compliance would be incompatible with the public interest. * * * The infliction of punishment by one coordinate branch upon the other would be wholly repugnant to the constitutional scheme. The Executive, no less than Congress, is accountable directly to the people, and ultimate decision in such matters must rest with the electorate."

The immediate future may bring forth from Calvin Coolidge an appeal to the electorate along the lines just above indicated.

AGRICULTURAL DIVERSIFICATION.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 2250) to promote a permanent system of self-supporting agriculture in regions adversely affected by the stimulation of wheat production during the war and aggravated by many years of small yields and high production costs of wheat.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH].

Mr. LODGE. Which amendment?

Mr. McKELLAR. Let the amendment be stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The READING CLERK. The senior Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] has offered the following amendment:

> "The Secretary, in executing the functions vested in him by this act, shall, so far as practicable, utilize the Federal intermediate credit banks system; and the Federal Farm Loan Board and the directors and officers of the Federal intermediate credit banks shall cooperate with the Secretary for such purpose."

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. WADSWORTH. We just had a quorum call.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There has been no business transacted since the last roll call. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Montana.

Mr. WALSH. I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the reading clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. LODGE (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Vermont [Mr. GREENE] and vote "nay."

Mr. McCORMICK (when his name was called). I have a standing pair with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN]. I find I can transfer that pair to the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], and I do so. I vote "nay."

Mr. PHIPPS (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. DIAL]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. SIMMONS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. HARRELD], but I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER] and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. SMITH (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] and vote "yea."

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts (when his name was called). On this question I am paired with the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY] and vote "yea."

Mr. WARREN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN], who is detained from the Chamber on account of illness. I therefore withhold my vote. I wish this announcement of my pair to stand for the day.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. TRAMMELL (after having voted in the affirmative). I have voted, but I desire to announce my pair with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT]. However, I feel at liberty to vote upon this question, and shall therefore let my vote stand.

Mr. FLETCHER (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a general pair with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BALL], who is absent. I am unable to obtain a transfer of that pair, and, therefore, I withdraw my vote.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I transfer my general pair with the Senator from Maine [Mr. FERNALD] to the Senator from Indiana [Mr. RALSTON] and vote "yea."

Mr. CURTIS. I desire to announce that the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] is paired with the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] on the pending amendment.

The roll call resulted—yeas 32, nays 32, as follows:

The PRESIDING OFFICER. On the amendment of the Senator from Montana the yeas are 32 and the nays are 32. So the amendment is rejected.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I had hoped that this amendment would prevail. We are going to loan $50,000,000 out in these Northwestern States. We have already set up a piece of loaning machinery and put it in the hands of men who are presumably somewhat familiar with banking principles, experienced in the loaning of money, competent to judge of the advisability of making a loan to this man or to that man. We have elected now to discard all of that machinery which we created—which we created less than a year ago—for the purpose of making loans to farmers. We are going to discard that machinery, and, bear in mind, authorize the Secretary of Agriculture to loan out $50,000,000, and to organize a new piece of machinery for the purpose of placing those loans.

Mr. President, we are on the eve of a national campaign; and I undertake to say that if this fund is distributed under the unrestrained discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture, we are as likely to have a scandal in connection with this transaction and this legislation as we had in connection with the matter that has been engaging the public attention here recently. If the Senators upon the other side of the Chamber want to relieve themselves from the almost inevitable inference that this is chiefly for political purposes, they will reconsider the vote just taken.

I shall not move a reconsideration, because I am in no situation to do so; but I shall offer another amendment giving the Senate a further chance to think about it.

After the word "livestock" in line 10, on page 4, I move to insert the following:

> The Secretary, in executing the functions vested in him by this act, may, so far as practicable, utilize the Federal intermediate credit-banks system; and the Federal Farm Loan Board and the directors and officers of the Federal intermediate credit banks shall cooperate with the Secretary for such purpose.

The amendment is identical with the amendment heretofore offered, except that it does not strike out anything; it leaves in the bill everything that is there, and it simply changes the word "shall" to "may," so that it is up to the Secretary of Agriculture whether or not he shall make use of this agency which has already been created by the Congress. The responsibility is his, now, whether he will take that machinery which has been provided by Congress or whether he will create a machinery of his own; and, bear in mind, his own unrestricted discretion is the guide to the machinery which he shall create. He is simply required to advise with these other people and to get information from them; and this places no obligation upon him, either. It simply provides that he may make use of them.

Mr. FLETCHER and Mr. COPELAND addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield, and to whom?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield the floor.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I merely wanted to suggest to the Senator that he will have an opportunity when the bill comes into the Senate to renew the offer of this amendment. The bill is now before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, and he will have another opportunity in the Senate to offer the same amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has that right.

Mr. COPELAND obtained the floor.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. COPELAND. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. I was going to suggest that we ought to have another vote upon the amendment in the Senate.

Mr. ROBINSON. Yes.

Mr. BORAH. I think it ought to be mandatory. We can have another vote in the Senate.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I give notice now that I shall ask for another vote on the amendment which has just been voted on when the bill comes into the Senate.

Mr. KENDRICK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair has recognized the Senator from New York.

Mr. COPELAND. I yield to the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. KENDRICK. Mr. President, I just want to say, as one of those who voted against this amendment, that the change proposed by the Senator from Montana makes the amendment absolutely satisfactory to me, and I believe it will be satisfactory to every Senator who voted the other way. Under the proposed change the provision becomes permissive instead of mandatory. The difficulty with the banking agencies is that they are too slow and unresponsive to meet the urgency of this situation. If any benefit at all is to come from this bill, it must come through prompt action; and, if the Senator will yield just a minute, I want to call the attention of the Senate to the experience in lending the money that we voted to the farmers in the West for seed purposes. These figures were given me this morning. I have not had time to get all of them, but this is the record:

Congress voted $2,000,000 for this purpose, and there were 17,000 applications. As I recall the provisions of the bill, the loans were to be made under the direction of the Secretary of Agriculture, the same as is proposed here, or substantially so. There were 17,200 applications; there were 13,935 individual loans, all made within a period of 40 days' time; and the total expense involved in making those loans, aggregating nearly $2,000,000—or, to be exact, $1,957,000—was $16,134.50.

If I may say just a word more about it to those who have found it necessary to criticize this bill so unsparingly, out of that two millions of dollars that were loaned to the farmers at that time there has been returned at the present time $1,222,710 of principal and $94,180 of interest.

I thank the Senator.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, yesterday the Senate heard from the able Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE] a very eloquent and, from his standpoint, a most logical speech against what he calls a paternalistic scheme of government. He expressed the fear that if this bill should prevail we would be laying the foundation of communism in this country, and that the destruction of government would naturally follow. I do not share the views of the Senator, and I hope to be able to explain why.

When we consider this bill we must not forget that the condition which it seeks to remedy is not entirely the fault of the farmer. The Northwest is facing a double calamity. Both these calamities, perhaps, are due to the same cause. First, there is the deprivation of profitable markets for wheat; but, in the second place, there is the failure of proper and sufficient banking support. As I see it, the reason why this particular measure should prevail is because the banking facilities of the Northwest are practically obliterated.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. KING. The Senator will understand that in the word "Northwest" he must not include the State of South Dakota, because, as I showed the other day, its prosperity is great; and the able Senator from Minnesota rose and stated that he was authorized to state that this bill did not apply to his State at all.

Mr. COPELAND. I will bear that in mind; but I also recall that in several States in the Northwest the local banks are going to smash. In one State 95 State banks failed very recently, and several of the national banks, and in one town in the West on one day eight banks failed.

I agree with the Senator from Georgia that in ordinary times there should be no interference with the recognized economic laws, and in ordinary times the usual and recognized rules of business and social conduct should be strictly observed; but where we have such a situation as this, where we are facing a great economic disaster, the ordinary rules can not be observed. In case of an earthquake or a great explosion the traffic laws of a city are trampled upon and disregarded, and we are dealing here with an analogous economic disaster.

In the States we exercise the police power. In time of imminent peril to the health and the physical well-being of the people extraordinary measures are adopted. We have in our State of New York passed a tax exemption law in order that dwellings may be built for the people. The ordinary methods of supply and demand did not bring about the building of these houses, and it was necessary to exclude from taxation many dwellings in order to stimulate a building program. In the same way we have chosen to pass rent laws, absolutely violating the ordinary rules of supply and demand, but limiting rents so as to make it impossible to raise them above a certain price, in order that the people should not be excluded from decent habitations. In different States there have been times when the price of bread has been fixed, and the grain elevator rates have been fixed. So I take it that the bill before us is in the nature of a similar emergency relief measure, made necessary by the inability of the farmers in the Northwest to finance proper efforts at diversified farming. It is not applicable to other farmers, of course, in localities where the banking facilities have not failed; but here is a situation where the crops have failed and where the banking facilities have failed at the same time. Bear in mind, too, that this bill does not propose a gratuity; it provides only for loans.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Mr. President——

Mr. COPELAND. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. REED of Missouri. The Senator is speaking of North Dakota. What did they do to the banks in North Dakota by law? Who destroyed the banks in North Dakota?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The import of the question asked by the Senator from Missouri does not escape any of us. My State has not passed any legislation destructive of banking interests, and yet there is a greater percentage of bank failures in the State of Montana than there is in North Dakota.

Mr. REED of Missouri. The Senator's State has had two or three wheat-crop failures, has it not?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. So they had in North Dakota.

Mr. REED of Missouri. The Senator's State may not have passed those laws, but I think the laws of North Dakota have something to do with the situation. I will, however, address myself to that matter in my own time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair must advise the Senator from New York that his time on the pending amendment has expired. He very generously yielded half his time to the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. KENDRICK].

Mr. COPELAND. I have not spoken on the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has 10 minutes on the bill.

Mr. COPELAND. I thank the Chair. I do not care what the cause of the bank failures is, if there is a banking situation which makes it impossible for these farmers to recoup or to reestablish themselves on a different basis, we must relieve them of the situation and make it possible for them to go on. It seems to me this bill is a very sensible one. It plainly speaks, at the bottom of the first page, in line 8, that its purpose is to change conditions "through the encouragement of a system of agriculture not dependent for its success upon wheat alone." In other words, this is to make provision for diversified farming.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield to the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. GLASS. I want to ask the Senator from New York when it became a proper function of Government to take the taxpayers' money to replenish deficiencies occasioned by mismanaged and failed banks?

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I do not care what the cause of the failure was. If by reason of the failure the farmers of that section are about to starve or go into bankruptcy, I say that it is the business of Government to find a way to relieve the situation and make it possible for them to engage in diversified agriculture.

Mr. GLASS. As a matter of fact, does not the Senator know that the sound banks of the country have ample funds to loan to people who are entitled to credit? Never since they were established have the Federal reserve banks of this country had a higher reserve percentage than they have to-day. But the Senator has not answered my question. I asked him when it became a constitutional function of this Government to take other people's money, to take money exacted from the common taxpayers of this country, and devote it to the purpose of replenishing deficiencies occasioned by failed banks?

Mr. COPELAND. Does not the Senator from Virginia recognize that in case of imminent peril or public necessity it may be necessary for the Government to do extraordinary things?

Mr. GLASS. Does the Senator think that there is imminent peril because the farmers of a small section have not up to this time diversified their crops? Is that a peril?

Mr. COPELAND. The Senator from New York does think so.

Mr. GLASS. Is that a national menace?

Mr. COPELAND. It is a menace to the people of that section, and I say that it is the business of the Government to relieve the people of the danger of the menace.

Mr. GLASS. Has there been any fault of the Government? Is the Government responsible for the fact that farmers in this section or any other section have not pleased to diversify their crops?

Mr. COPELAND. The Government is not responsible if a smallpox epidemic comes along, but the smallpox epidemic comes, and when it does come it is the function of the Government to find a way to control it.

Mr. GLASS. The Senator does not give us an analogy at all, and he has not yet answered my question as to what constitutional right the Government has to take funds exacted from all of the taxpayers and appropriate them to an extraordinary use, as this is.

Mr. COPELAND. I do not suppose the Senator from Virginia and I will ever agree on this subject.

Mr. GLASS. I am sure not.

Mr. COPELAND. But so far as I am concerned, my vote will be given always to help people who by reason of circumstances beyond their control are not able to help themselves.

Mr. GLASS. It is all right if the Senator will take his own money to do that, but I deny his right to take mine to do it if I do not want it done.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. BROOKHART. With reference to this constitutional right referred to by the Senator from Virginia, have we not as much constitutional right to do this as we had to appropriate $24,000,000 for the relief of the Russians?

Mr. GLASS. The chief argument for that was that it was to be used to buy wheat and relieve the wheat situation.

Mr. BROOKHART. It was constitutional, was it not?

Mr. GLASS. No; it was not constitutional.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I do not know any reason why we should get excited when we are trying to help the farmer. I hope Senators will not get excited over it. I will admit at once that this is a makeshift measure——

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. President, I did not have the pleasure of hearing the argument of the Senator at length. I heard him state, however, that this appropriation is justified on the ground of imminent peril or public necessity. Will the Senator state just what the imminent peril is?

Mr. COPELAND. The peril of bankruptcy and the peril of human suffering incident to it. That is peril enough to justify me in the position I take.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York declines further to yield.

Mr. COPELAND. I have given about 20 minutes of my time already. I want to say that I consider this a makeshift measure, but a very necessary one under the circumstances. It does not go to the root of the trouble. The reason why these farmers have no markets for their products is that a Republican administration has failed to find a way to rehabilitate Europe, so that the markets and commerce of the world might be reestablished.

I had occasion last year to go up to the Russian border in Poland to study health conditions. When I got to Warsaw I found the Government knew I was coming, and they did everything they could to make it pleasant for me. They assigned a member of the cabinet to look after me. Of course, at the present time, if a member of the cabinet were assigned to look after a United States Senator, it might cause some criticism; but it went all right then.

This cabinet officer placed at my disposal a private car, not the kind of a car Harry Sinclair rode in when going down to Three Rivers, N. Mex., but if you will imagine the caboose of a freight train you will have a good idea of my car. To make a farmer from New York feel entirely at home they put a Ford automobile on this car. They gave me a chauffeur, a cook, a servant, an interpreter, and a doctor. That was some retinue for a Democrat to travel with. Then the minister said, "I am sorry that we have no provision for purchasing food. The Government will supply the food and cook it for you, but you will have to pay for the food." I said, "That is fair. I will pay for the food for the party."

I was gone four days on that particular trip, and when I got back to Warsaw I paid off this retinue of servants so liberally that they bowed to the floor in appreciation of my generosity. I paid them, and paid for the food for the entire party, and the whole bill was $3.50 in American money.

That shows why Europeans can not buy our produce. Until Europe is rehabilitated, until the markets of the world are reestablished, we are going to continue to have trouble in this country because of the lack of sale of our products. So I say that that is the fundamental thing and the particular thing in which the Republican Party has failed. In the meantime, we must give the wheat farmers the relief they seek to prevent economic annihilation.

There is a situation in the Northwest which makes it necessary for these people to appeal for relief. I say it is right and proper that this Government should recognize this emergency and should take the necessary steps to make the appropriation asked for in order that relief in this temporary emergency may be afforded.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, I want to say just a word, suggested by a remark of the Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND]. He talks about the obligation of the Government to "take care of farmers." The truth of the business is that for the last four years in the Congress of the United States we have been departing from all proper constitutional considerations and doing things in the name of the farmers which were altogether unusual and mischievous.

When the Senator talks about relief for the farmers I am prompted to inquire what farmers and how many farmers? To better illustrate what I mean, I have in mind now one of the Northwestern States, not to be too specific. There are in that State, all told, according to the last census, 69,000 farmers. The State paid into the United States Treasury $2,096,000 in 1922.

The State of Virginia has 1,067,000 farmers, or 1,000,000 more farmers than this particular Northwestern State. Virginia paid into the Federal Treasury $46,900,000 in 1922. I am asked here to vote to further tax the 1,067,000 farmers in the State of Virginia and take the money thus exacted from them for governmental purposes exclusively and appropriate it to the use of 69,000 farmers in one of these Northwestern States.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President——

Mr. GLASS. In a moment. Why are the taxes of my 1,067,000 farmers in Virginia to be appropriated to the uses of these 67,000 farmers in another State? To enable the farmers of this other State to compete with the Virginia farmers in producing poultry and pigs and cattle. Furthermore, more than a million Virginia farmers are to be taxed to loan their money to other farmers in order that those other farmers may charge the Virginia farmers more for the bread they have to eat. So that you catch the Virginia farmer going and coming.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. GLASS. I yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. COPELAND. I assume that in Virginia the farmers have mutual fire-insurance companies, and that when one farmer is unfortunate enough to have a fire the farmers who are fortunate and do not have fires contribute a little to help him. I take it that the farmers of the Northwest when they are restored to prosperity and difficulty comes to the Virginia farmers will be glad to pay their share of the taxes.

Mr. GLASS. The Virginia farmer does not want anything of the kind. Virginia farmers do not want the Constitution of the United States outraged for their advantage. Virginia farmers are not in any such situation as that, and not a great many other farmers are.

Were we to confine ourselves to reading the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD we should conclude that in at least one State the three major industries are insane asylums, almshouses, and cemeteries, because the population so often has been described as having been impoverished by the policies of the Federal Government and driven to suicide or insanity.

The farmers of this country generally are in no such situation. Those in my section of the country are not; they are not in many other sections of the country.

In North Carolina there are 1,500,000 farmers. There are nearly as many farmers in that one State as there is population in these four Northwestern States. North Carolina pays into the Federal Treasury, as shown by the last available statistics, $124,000,000 in taxes per annum.

The taxes of the million and a half farmers of North Carolina are to be appropriated to the uses of a few farmers somewhere else in order that the latter may be given a capital stock to compete with the farmers of North Carolina. As the distinguished Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE] said the other day this is not even socialism. It does not approach in respectability the doctrine of communism. It is special privilege run mad. I am getting tired of seeing, even on this side the Chamber, Senators in the guise of Democracy, professing the principles of Thomas Jefferson, voting to outrage every principle that Jefferson ever avowed with respect to government.

I hold, Mr. President, that taxation primarily, solely indeed, is for the purpose of insuring an effective and economic administration of the Federal Government. When funds are taken for any other use they are being improperly diverted.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia yield?

Mr. GLASS. I yield.

Mr. BROOKHART. Are the farmers of Virginia and North Carolina prosperous now?

Mr. GLASS. Are they prosperous?

Mr. BROOKHART. Yes.

Mr. GLASS. They are not making an appeal to Congress for help.

Mr. BROOKHART. That is not an answer to my question. Are they in fact prosperous at this time?

Mr. GLASS. The fruit growers of the great valley of Virginia have had three successive bad years; but they are not coming up to Congress and asking that Congress shall take from the common tax fund, exacted from all the people, any sums for their relief.

Mr. BROOKHART. From what the Senator said, they are really not prosperous in either of those States.

Mr. GLASS. If they are not prosperous, I will tell the Senator why. There is scarcely one product of the farm which today is not quoted in the open market at a higher price than prevailed for that product on the average for 25 years preceding the war.

Mr. BROOKHART. Yes; but——

Mr. GLASS. Just wait a minute. I want to tell the Senator why, if they are not prosperous. I say there is scarcely a product of the farm, from the chickens which we are to supply to these Northwestern States up to wheat or tobacco or cotton or peanuts, or anything else, that is not higher than it was for 25 years preceding the war on the average. The difficulty is that the commodities for which the farmer has to exchange his produce are so unreasonably high owing to the emergency tariff and the other tariffs which the Republican Party fastened upon his farmers of the West.

Mr. BROOKHART. I did not fasten the tariff upon the farmers.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Virginia on the amendment has expired. The Senator has 10 minutes on the bill, if he so desires.

Mr. BROOKHART. I want to ask the Senator a question.

Mr. REED of Missouri obtained the floor.

Mr. BROOKHART. I desire to ask the Senator from Virginia another question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Virginia has yielded the floor. The Senator from Missouri is recognized. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. BROOKHART. No; it was with the Senator from Virginia on the floor that I desired to follow up with the question I started.

Mr. REED of Missouri. The Senator may ask me the question.

Mr. GLASS. And I will trust the Senator from Missouri to answer the question, too.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri has the floor. Does he yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. REED of Missouri. If the Senator desires to ask me a question, I yield.

Mr. BROOKHART. Relating to the statement of the Senator from Virginia in which he pointed out——

Mr. REED of Missouri. I wish the Senator would ask me a question, because my time is running very rapidly.

Mr. BROOKHART. The Senator from Virginia said the lack of prosperity on the part of the farmer was because of a tax on the products he has to buy and other combinations which have been put upon the farmers. I am in complete accord with that, but I want to even up this thing. I want to ask if it is not fair to even the thing up and let us levy a tax on those profits to take care of the farmers who are in distress?

Mr. REED of Missouri. That is a question we will reach when we get to it. We are not now levying taxes on profits. If the Senator will introduce such a measure I may support it.

Mr. BROOKHART. I shall remember that remark, and I hope to offer an amendment of that kind to the revenue bill when it comes before the Senate.

Mr. REED of Missouri. I will say to the Senator that when we had the battle over surtaxes I voted every time for higher surtaxes than went into the bill on those exceedingly great incomes. We may be in agreement, and then each of us may suspect the other of being wrong because we are in agreement upon that bill.

But let us get back to the question. The Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND] has discussed the banking situation. He said the banks are all broken in the Northwestern States. This is not a bill to rehabilitate banking. There is nothing said in the bill about establishing new chains of banks. If there was, we would discuss that question.

Mr. BURSUM. Mr. President——

Mr. REED of Missouri. But if the banks are broken——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. REED of Missouri. I yield; but I can yield only a moment, as my time is very limited.

Mr. BURSUM. I merely want to advise the Senator that I have an amendment which I shall propose that will take care of the banks.

Mr. REED of Missouri. When we get to that we will take care of it. It is not here now. I am not a sufficient prophet to tell whether it will ever be here. One thing we do know is that in one of those States, at least, there was some legislation that is believed to have had the effect of destroying many banks. The Senator said the United States Government must keep step with disaster. That was almost his expression. That is to say, if it found there is a piece of foolish legislation that wrecks business institutions or every time people make foolish investments the United States Government must come in and make up the loss. That is a new theory in government. If it were generally adopted in the country, all of us who have gone through the world and made very little money would be able to go in and speculate on everything, and if we lost money the Federal Government would be called on to make up the loss. It is a new system of economics. I think it ought to entitle its author to a species of immortality. I almost said immorality. It would be political immorality.

Then we are told that this is a question of imminent peril and public necessity. This is a singular definition of public necessity, one that never was heard before and that never was found in the book.

It is no definition of public necessity that will cover the question of the farmers of a certain section having failed to raise pigs when they ought to have raised pigs according to the theory of the bill, and that that creates very imminent peril or public necessity.

Let us get back to the bill and what the bill proposes to do. It proposes to encourage a system of agriculture not dependent for its success upon wheat alone, but cultivation which would include the raising of livestock, such as dairy and beef cattle, hogs, sheep, poultry, and the products thereof. It also proposes that the Secretary of Agriculture may purchase such livestock and supply the same to the borrower at cost, such advances or loans or sales to be made upon such terms and conditions and subject to such regulations as the Secretary may prescribe.

Mr. President, why have these farmers in the Northwest not diversified their industry? I do not know, but I will undertake to say that you can take the average farmer of any one of those Northwestern States and he knows better what to plant in his field and what to raise on his farm than all the Congressmen assembled in Washington know. I will undertake to say that his wife knows more about that than all the Congressmen know. I will undertake to say that his freckled-faced 14-year-old boy knows better what to raise to make money on those farms than all the men in this Chamber know. If you are going to establish yourselves as wet nurses for the farmers of this country, some of you had better qualify a little and know something about it. Men are here proposing to tell the farmers of the Northwest that they have not been raising the right kind of crops, that they have not been raising the right kind of chickens or pigs or calves. Men are undertaking that who never saw North Dakota, who never stuck a plow in the ground in their lives, who do not know whether they raise spring wheat or winter wheat in that country, who could not tell a crop of prairie grass from alfalfa, and who would require a guide to take them through any country lane to keep them from running into hedge fences. It is utterly absurd and ridiculous. [Laughter in the galleries. The Chair rapped for order.] Has my time expired or are the occupants of the galleries misbehaving? I am endeavoring to behave myself.

There never was a more absurd thing in the world than for the Congress of the United States to try to tell the people of the great Northwestern States what they ought to raise, yet that is the purpose of the bill. Then it is proposed to turn over to the Secretary of Agriculture the purchase of this stuff. Now, I question whether the Secretary of Agriculture himself could tell a Jersey cow from the Holstein at a rough guess.

Mr. KING. He knows how to milk them, we are told by the newspapers. He had a milking contest with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. JOHNSON].

Mr. REED of Missouri. I have the greatest feeling of friendship for the Senator from Minnesota. I understand he can qualify as a milker of cows, but he now appears——

Mr. JOHNSON of Minnesota. I wish to inform the Senator from Missouri that the assertion was a newspaper assertion.

Mr. REED of Missouri. But whether the Senator from Minnesota can milk cows or not, he is here with a bill proposing to milk Uncle Sam dry. That is what the proposition is. I do not know whether the Senator can milk cows or not. I have the utmost friendship for him. I heard some ridicule indulged in here before he came, but it has all ceased since he came. I like to have that part of the country represented by men who can represent it, and I think the Senator is doing a very good job.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. REED of Missouri. I yield.

Mr. STANLEY. Surely the Senator does not mean to intimate that these statesmen are not milkers, whether of a Holstein cow or anything else?

Mr. REED of Missouri. They are very good milkers when they are undertaking to milk the Federal Government.

Think of the absurdity of it. Here is a man who has farmed all his life. He has gone into the Northwest, and he has studied the soil and has studied the climate. He is not a fool. He may have struck bad crops and hard times, but he is not a fool. He is an intelligent man. He saw fit to raise particular crops because they would be best in that community and in that country. He could get the best out of it. Then the Senate proposes to legislate here that he ought to have been raising something else. That farmer you are talking about could sell you a spavined horse or a moon-eyed horse or a poll-evil horse and you would think you had got a thoroughbred until you tried him out. That same farmer could turn over to you a cholera-infected pig; you would buy it; and when you ate the bacon you would not know what you were eating. You simply propose to sit up here and undertake to tell people what they shall raise on their farms. I say it is an insult to their intelligence, and it is an insult to the intelligence of this body to undertake it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Missouri has expired.

Mr. JOHNSON of Minnesota. Mr. President, I should like to answer the Senator from Missouri. I do not want to compare myself with that able Senator, because he has been down in his own State campaigning and practicing up. I want, however, to inform him of the reason why the farmers of the State of North Dakota are hard up. A former Member of this body for many years—the late Senator Gronna, of North Dakota—I remember well at a convention held in the city of St. Paul informed us that he went home from the Senate because there was a call to raise more wheat in order to feed the boys across the sea. Senator Gronna made the statement:

I went home and I ripped up 14,000 acres of soil in order to raise wheat.

The Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] compared the number of farmers in North Dakota with the number of farmers in Virginia; I understand, though I am not sure, that the average size of a farm in North Dakota is 480 acres. There would not be so many farmers in Virginia if they had such large farms.

The farmers of the Northwest, as Senators all know, began raising grain. Here, however, is one thing that the Democrats on the other side do not wish to touch upon; that is, that the wheat which the farmers of that region grew was raised at a fixed price, a maximum price, if you please. Therefore when they raised those millions of bushels of wheat they did not get an honest and fair return for their labor.

I wish, so to say, to back up the statements of the able Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND] when he got after the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARRIS] when he spoke a day or so ago. He did not, however, say one thing about the banking situation in the great Northwestern States. Let me review the situation there. As I stated the other day, the farmers of the State of Wisconsin and those in probably 65 per cent of the area of the State of Minnesota are not down here asking for any relief. Why should they do so when they are in the dairy business? And if the wheat farmers in other sections of the State of Minnesota were in the dairy business, as are the people in the section where I live, neither would they come down here asking for this relief. However, let us go across the river into the State of North Dakota and then into the State of Montana, and we shall find that the citizens from those States are here asking for relief, because they have been raising wheat.

The Senator from South Dakota is not here, but repeatedly before the committee he said, "This bill has nothing to do with my own State." I read his own statement before the committee or the statement in his speech on this floor just the day before he left for the campaign in his own State, that "We raise five bushels of corn to every bushel of wheat which we produce in the State of South Dakota." If that were the condition in other sections of the Northwest, everything would be all right there, too.

However, referring to the banking situation, it may be said in some quarters that because a certain political party has been running wild in North Dakota the banks are broke. But that can not be said of Montana and other States, particularly New Mexico, where a greater percentage of banks are broke than even in the State of North Dakota, as Senators on the other side of the Chamber will realize if they will look up the figures.

I stated on the floor of the Senate the other day, and I repeat it now, that I had promised the people that I would not attempt to come down here to ask for more credit, for we already have too much credit; but the banks are in the position that they can not loan one dollar, because they are already overloaned. This bill will enable the farmers to buy three or four cows apiece, and if they milk the cows there will be something for the farmer and his family to live on anyway. That is the reason that I am for the pending bill, and I hope it will be passed.

I understand that the Democrats are a little bit afraid that if the bill passes the Republican Party is going to profit somewhat by it. I have not any interest in that matter, so to say; I do not care what happens to the Republican Party, because I do not belong to the Republican Party. [Laughter.] I should like to see the Republican Party get in just as bad as it possibly can, so we can lick them with a third party at the next election. [Laughter.]

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, I expect to vote for the amendment offered by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] to this bill; indeed, I have already done so, and I shall do so again when it is taken up in the Senate after having been disposed of by the Senate as in Committee of the Whole. I voted for that amendment because if the enormous sum of $50,000,000 is to be applied to agricultural conditions in the Northwest I think it would be better that it should be applied by the agencies which the Senator from Montana has suggested than by the Secretary of Agriculture. I shall vote also for the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HOWELL] because unquestionably if there are to be transactions between the Government and the farmers of the Northwest under the bill it is safer for the Government that those transactions should assume the form of conditional sales rather than that of mere hypothecations.

To the bill itself, however, Mr. President, I am inflexibly, irreconcilably opposed. If it stood alone it might not have the significance to me that it has. It might then be set down simply as an exceptional aberration from sound principles of public policy to say nothing of sound constitutional principles. But it does not stand alone; and when connected up with the bills of one sort or another now pending in the Committee on Interstate Commerce looking to the Government ownership of the railroads, and with the McNary-Haugen bill, and the Norris bill, and other measures of that character which contemplate a still larger participation by the Government in the private business of the individual, it points with the iron finger of fate to a steady drift upon the part of the Northwestern States of the Union toward State socialism.

It has often been observed that in modern times when a people fall away from Catholicism they do not go over to Protestantism, but to agnosticism or some other form of religious indifference or negation. So the Northwestern States, which were so long and inveterately wedded to the Republican Party, are not gravitating to the Democratic Party; not at all; they are moving, and steadily moving, as I have said, in the direction of some form or other of civil polity socialistic in its nature. They may be doing it unconsciously, but, all the same, they are being drawn in that direction more and more rapidly as time goes on. That is the reason why ever since I have occupied a seat in the Senate I have been unwilling, as I shall continue to be unwilling, to form any alliance of any sort with the representatives generally in this Chamber of the Northwestern States. For many of these gentlemen I entertain the warmest regard personally, and I have a sincere respect for their personal virtues and talents; but their bloc is not inclining to the Democratic Party and is wandering away further and further from the Republican Party. The regular Republicans on the other side of the Chamber have had the good sense to adjust their relations to them accordingly, and the Democrats in this Chamber should imitate the example of these Republicans.

I for one believe that the economic depression in the Northwest has been grossly exaggerated; or, if not grossly exaggerated, at least very much exaggerated. Did I not point out here only a day or so ago, when with the aid of the chart hanging upon that wall the able Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] was about to proceed with his lecture, that in 1923 the ordinary savings-bank deposits in the State of North Dakota increased from $9,000,000 to $12,000,000? Did I not also point out that in the same year the number of automobiles in use in the State of North Dakota increased by 10,000? Only to-day the Census Bureau has given us a report as to the increase of wealth in some of the Northwestern States during the decade ending with the close of 1922? What does that report show? We hear the State of Montana spoken of as if it were poverty stricken and had the right to apply here for pecuniary relief in forma pauperis, like some poor, indigent suitor who goes into a court in that character because he is unable to employ counsel at his own expense. Yet the figures just given out by the Census Bureau show that in the decade just mentioned by me the total value of property in the State of Montana nearly doubled, having increased 98.2 per cent. In Iowa the increase was 37.2 per cent, in Minnesota 58.9 per cent, in Nebraska, 44.2 per cent, in Oregon 68.3 per cent, and in Colorado 40.9 per cent. I take these figures from the Washington Evening Star of yesterday; and I might have gone on the other day and pointed out that, with an exception or so, in every one of the Northwestern States that are supposed to be in such a terrible plight the ordinary savings-bank deposits were handsomely augmented in the year 1923.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BRUCE. I should be glad to do so, but, as the Senator knows, I am limited in point of time, and interruptions are counted up against me. But for that I should be glad to yield.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maryland declines to yield.

Mr. BRUCE. So I say conditions in the Northwest, in my opinion, have been very much exaggerated. But suppose they are as bad as they are represented as being; is that any reason why the fundamental principles of our Government should be violated? Is that any reason why the people of the Northwestern States should not rely more upon their own exertions and less upon Government patronage? As the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN] pointed out a few days ago, New England is the one section of the United States in which not a few farmers have actually abandoned their farms, because they could make nothing out of them; but did we see the New England farmer, that sturdy individual, who has been relying from the beginning upon his own individual efforts to make his own fortune, apply for Government relief? No; he entered some other industry, or migrated to more fertile lands than those of New England, or got down still more closely to the task of making his New England farm pay, breathing the spirit of Emerson's words as he did so:

My garden is the cloven rock and my manure the snow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's time has expired on the pending amendment.

Mr. BRUCE. Then I will continue on the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has 10 minutes on the bill.

Mr. BRUCE. Very well. So with the Virginian farmer, to whom the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] so eloquently referred. I was executor for a Virginian farmer in the year 1896. I sold corn that year, as I remember, for 40 cents a bushel, and wheat for 60 cents a bushel. I sold on one occasion 96 sheep of all ages for the sum of $1 a head on the farm of the decedent; but did the farmers of Virginia then whimper and whine or look to anything but their own honest, laborious exertions for their salvation? Did they come to the Government and ask the privilege of applying their lips to its teats? Did they claim that the Government was a sort of free dispensary, a kind of eleemosynary institution to which resort was to be had whenever there was more or less passing agricultural distress? They did not. The trouble with the people of the Northwest is that they have had not too little but too much done for them by the Government.

The Northwest was hatched out in the very beginning by the warmth of an artificial incubator. The farmer in that region obtained his lands from the Government at a nominal or very low cost; he had railroad transportation furnished to him largely by Federal and State bounties.

More recently has come along the era of governmental price fixing and of tariff duties, imposed for the alleged protection of the agricultural products of the farmer, and in the Northwest the farmer has fallen into the fatal habit of relying upon Government patronage in all his difficulties.

Some years ago Bill Nye, the humorist, said that the people of the United States consisted of two classes—those who depend on work for a living and those who look to legislation and their wives' relations. The vice of the Northwest is that it is too much in the habit of looking to legislation and its wives' relations—that is to say, the other States of the Union and their tax resources—for aid in the ordinary vicissitudes of human energy.

This bill is just another step in the progress of State socialism. It will do no lasting good even to the people of the Northwest. A few days ago I recevied one of the best letters that I ever read in my life from an old resident of North Dakota. He knew what the situation in the Northwest really is.

One of its misfortunes, he said, was that there had been a great influx of immigration from Europe into that region that was deeply tinctured with European socialistic ideas, though he did, I am glad to say, have the candor to add that many of these immigrants were very fine citizens, indeed, an opinion which I heartily share.

In my opinion the inevitable tendency of this bill, if it goes into effect, will be to impoverish the spirit of the people of the Northwest, to sap those habits of self-reliance which made the early history of our great West one of the grandest epics in the history of the human race, and to destroy those principles of individual initiative, individual energy, and individual ambition upon which the splendid structure of American progress, prosperity, and happiness has been reared.

So, as you see, Mr. President, I am not so much disposed to look at the details of this bill as I am to look at the underlying political tendencies which characterize it, and which to my mind establish the fact that in a short time the struggle in this country will be not between the Democratic and the Republican Parties so much as between the conservative elements of our American population and those which are sometimes termed progressives and sometimes radicals. Should a truly momentous conflict arise between these antagonistic elements, I care not what you call me, Republican, Democrat, or what not, I will be found with the party which shall entrench itself behind the ramparts of the Federal Constitution and the distinctive American ideas and ideals to which we owe all our greatness as a nation.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, I am among those who are very much distressed over this particular legislation. I find myself fearful lest my vote should cause me to be thought to concur with the arguments of those who vote as I do. There are some in the Chamber who seem to feel that nothing new has been discovered since 1776. They seem to think that this is a day to protect the hitching posts along the highways, notwithstanding it is the day of automobiles.

Out in our mining country we have a story of a card game when one of the players had from time to time slipped a card into his boot until he had accumulated four aces, and then, finding an opportune time, put his whole pile on the table and reached for the hand in his boot, and found that some one had seen him and had taken it out; and he said, "Here, I will not play in this game; it is not on the square."

Senators come on the floor here and say that the trouble with the Northwest is that legislation has done too much for the Northwest. I concur with them when they say that the plight of the farmers in the Northwest to-day, as I see it, is primarily due to Congress, primarily due to the fact that Congress has done too much to them. The plight of the farmers in the Northwest is due to Congress, and Congress owes something to the farmers to make restitution for what it has done.

It is perfectly useless to say that it will lead into paternalism. It is perfectly proper for Congress to tax me, to tax my neighbors, through tariff taxes, in order to benefit some manufacturer or some man along the shores of the Atlantic. It is absolutely wrong when Congress seeks to tax the man along the Atlantic for the benefit of the farmer. In other words, the policy that the Government founded and has carried on in its tariff policies and in its foreign-relations policies has resulted in the present unfortunate economic condition in the Northwest. A fictitious value has been placed upon those things which the farmer must buy. He is denied his market, and that is the act of Congress. It is well enough to talk of fundamental principles, and if it can all be put upon an equality I will agree with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. BRUCE]; let us not use the taxing power for the benefit of any man, but when you use the taxing power to destroy one man do not come back and say the Government should not step in and help him.

Unfortunately my situation is this: I think an obligation rests upon Congress to do something for the farmers, not only of the Northwest but of all the West, including my State; but I do not think that this particular bill is accomplishing it in the right way. I do not believe that it is reaching the problem. I am disappointed that the men who advocate this measure are unwilling to put their finger upon the real cause and say to us, "Let us give temporary help, and then let us remove the real cause. Let us take down the tariff walls. Let us take down the barriers to international trade." When they say that, I will go with them as far as necessary to meet an emergency. If the Northwest needs help, I will vote it. I differed with them when they refused to eliminate from this bill help for 1925 and 1926. That indicates some lack of comprehension of the emergency. I will go as far as possible to help in an emergency. I come from a State which was stricken with catastrophe some years ago, and Congress came to the rescue of my community. They voted the taxpayers' money for my flood-stricken community, and when an emergency strikes in other parts of the land I am prepared to reciprocate.

This bill, however, is a badly drawn bill. It is a badly conceived bill. It has been carried on beyond the point to which it ought to go, and I am being driven into voting against it, I am afraid, because of the way in which it is drawn. To-day the friends of the measure refused to put the administration of it in the hands of what I think are the more efficient administrators of the Government. So, differing absolutely with those who oppose the bill upon the so-called grounds of constitutionality, I fear that I shall be compelled to vote against it because of its form, because it has not been kept within its proper scope as a measure for immediate relief.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. President, this bill aptly illustrates the extent to which we have gone in the perversion of public funds and in the use of the taxing power for the purpose of helping Tom, Dick, or Harry whenever and wherever the need may arise.

I have been literally amazed at the reasons given for the passage of this bill. For instance, the Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND], in response to a question, said that he favored the bill on the ground of imminent peril and urgent necessity. Whether you can invade the constitutional rights of the citizen or stretch the tether of the Government even under the excuse of imminent peril and urgent necessity I am very much inclined to doubt. Imminent peril implies a peril that is at hand and limited in time. An imminent peril can not abide for weeks or months. Urgent necessity means something that is here now, that must be done forthwith and before you can take time to invoke the orderly methods of government, before you can take time to grant the relief without violation of constitutional limitations. Under the excuse of imminent peril and urgent necessity when the earth shook San Francisco into ruins, when the sea enveloped a Texas city—Galveston—in its hungry maw, Congress made a small appropriation, because we thought the necessity was such that the example would not be pernicious; but that was the camel's nose.

I ask the Senator from New York, what is his ground? He says "urgent necessity." What, Mr. Senator, is the imminent peril or urgent necessity? He says the farmers are in imminent peril of losing money, that there is urgent necessity to save them from financial disaster. Is there any man engaged in business in the United States who does not face imminent peril of losing money? Was there ever a time when more or less of us were not in financial distress? One wiser even than the junior Senator from New York declared that the poor we have always with us. That was 2,000 years ago, and they do not seem to have decreased any in the Northwestern States.

The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. JOHNSON] makes an argument even more startling in favor of this bill than the argument of "imminent peril" and "urgent necessity." The Senator from Minnesota tells us that, of course, the farmers in Virginia do not need any help, that they have only about 50 acres of land apiece, but he says, "We have 600 acres apiece in Minnesota, and who can run 600 acres without Government aid?" If they had 6,000 acres they would be utterly and hopelessly gone.

Mr. JOHNSON of Minnesota. Will the Senator from Kentucky yield?

Mr. STANLEY. Certainly.

Mr. JOHNSON of Minnesota. I wish to inform the Senator from Kentucky that the bigger the farms in North Dakota and Montana to raise wheat on, the worse off they got. If they had a small farm, they did not lose so much money.

Mr. STANLEY. I understand thoroughly; and they have all big farms——

Mr. JOHNSON of Minnesota. If you have a small dairy farm, you can make a living——

Mr. STANLEY. Exactly.

Mr. JOHNSON of Minnesota. Because the corn bill and the labor bill and everything will be low. I am willing to give the Republicans credit for putting up the tariff under which we had to buy our machinery.

Mr. STANLEY. Think of it! We are irrigating lands, we are turning over hundreds of thousands of acres, and the more land they get, the more we will have to pay to keep them on it, and to keep them up. Think of it! In my State a hundred acres is a good farm. It will take 10 Kentucky farmers, ground to earth by taxation, to keep one farmer going in the Northwest, if he happens to have a little farm of a thousand acres, or 600 acres! That, with all due respect to the able Senator from Minnesota, is a reductio ad absurdum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the senior Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH].

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I wish to submit a unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. NORRIS. Will the Senator from Kansas withhold that for just a moment and let us vote on the amendment? I do not think there is any objection to it. It is to modify the second paragraph.

Mr. CURTIS. I am willing to withhold my request until after the vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the senior Senator from Montana.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CURTIS. I ask unanimous consent that after the hour of 1 o'clock p. m. on the calendar day of Thursday, March 13, 1924, no Senator shall speak more than once nor longer than 10 minutes upon the bill S. 2250 and more than five minutes upon any amendment offered thereto.

Mr. ROBINSON. Is the Senator satisfied that it is impossible to complete consideration of the bill to-day?

Mr. CURTIS. I am. I expect to ask unanimous consent also that when we conclude the business of the Senate to-day we shall take a recess until 12 o'clock to-morrow, so that we can let the bill be considered from 12 o'clock on. That would give us an hour with the 10-minute limit on debate, and for the balance of the time we would have a 5-minute limit on debate.

Mr. ROBINSON. I should very much prefer, having had such prolonged discussion of the bill, to fix a time at which to vote, but I am informed that the arrangement can not be effectuated, so I make no objection to the request of the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. CURTIS. I have tried to bring about that agreement, but there are two or three Senators who object to fixing a time to vote.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. CURTIS. I yield.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I have frequently discussed just such proposals before, and I do not believe that we have ever had an instance which more clearly demonstrated the importance of limiting the time for discussion and limiting the extent of speaking, but at the same time not fixing a time for voting.

Mr. ROBINSON. The difficulty in not fixing a time for a vote is that under which the Senate is laboring now. A number of Senators are compelled to be absent from the Chamber to attend committee meetings. That is the principal reason why we can not vote this afternoon, no arrangement for a vote having been effected. The same condition will in all probability exist to-morrow, but I make no objection to an agreement such as is proposed, since the time for the final vote is not to be fixed.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I think the distinguished Senator from Arkansas can hardly insist upon what he just said as an argument that limiting debate causes Senators to stay in the Chamber. I think that is one function that the limiting of debate performs.

Mr. ROBINSON. We are laboring now under a very reasonable limitation on debate, the limit being 10 minutes, and yet a large number of Senators who are interested in the bill are absent from the Chamber, because they are attending committee meetings. I am not saying that limitation on debate does not ordinarily attract Senators into the Chamber. But I make no further point about the matter. An agreement to vote can not be reached, so let the agreement be entered into, unless the Senator from New Mexico desires to object.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I simply want to suggest that I have never listened to a debate on any bill which has really brought out more information than the debate upon the pending bill. It has been debated in thorough earnestness on both sides of the Chamber, and I do not think such debate as we have been listening to on the bill is at all harmful to the Senate or harmful when we consider the information which the country will obtain from it. That is the reason why I am unwilling to agree to a time when the vote shall be taken. If the Senator from Montana had offered his amendment this afternoon under such an agreement, there would have been no opportunity even to explain the amendment after the hour for voting arrived. I do not know what other amendments may be proposed to the bill. Certainly we ought to have a short time in which to hear the explanation of amendments which may be offered and to discuss such amendments in at least a brief way.

Mr. NORRIS. As I understand, the proposition of the Senator from Kansas does not conflict with the idea of the Senator from New Mexico. The only difference is that he proposes to change the limitation after a certain time from 10 minutes to 5 minutes. That will be sufficient time to make the explanation which the Senator from New Mexico has in mind.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I understand; but I also understand that I was the person referred to by the Senator from Arkansas when he said they were unable to get an agreement for a time to vote.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator from New Mexico is laboring under a misapprehension. I had no information that he had expressed any view upon the subject. My information was that another Senator, a Senator on the other side of the Chamber, objected to fixing a time to vote.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I am willing to recognize the old proverb that a guilty conscience needs no accuser. I did tell the Senator from Kansas that I could not agree to fixing a time to vote.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not want the Senator from New Mexico to get the idea that I was criticizing him for objecting. I think that when we fix a time to take a vote and without debate must vote on all amendments that may be offered—and there may be a hundred of them offered—it is a very unfortunate way to legislate. I have felt many times that I never would consent to that kind of a unanimous-consent agreement again, but we will be driven to it unless, as the debate proceeds, we narrow down the length of time for the speeches of Senators. First, on the bill for several days there was no time limit on speeches. Then we have had two or three days limited to 10-minute speeches. It seems to me it is a very reasonable proposition that now, commencing at 1 o'clock to-morrow on a bill which we supposed would be disposed of two or three days ago, the limit should be put at five minutes.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I do not object to the request of the Senator from Kansas.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the proposed unanimous-consent agreement submitted by the Senator from Kansas.

The READING CLERK. The Senator from Kansas proposes the following unanimous-consent agreement:

It is agreed by unanimous consent that after the hour of 1 o'clock p. m. on the calendar day of Thursday, March 13, 1924, no Senator shall speak more than once nor longer than five minutes upon the bill (S. 2250) to promote a permanent system of self-supporting agriculture in regions adversely affected by the stimulation of wheat production during the war and aggravated by many years of small yields and high production costs of wheat, and five minutes upon any amendment offered thereto.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request submitted by the Senator from Kansas? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. CURTIS. I now ask unanimous consent that when the Senate conclude its business to-day it take a recess until 12 o'clock to-morrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. WILLIS. Not in the nature of an objection, but I wonder whether the Senator from Kansas has forgotten the notice given by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE].

Mr. CURTIS. I have not forgotten it. I spoke to the Senator from Massachusetts, and he will give the notice for some other day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request submitted by the Senator from Kansas? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, we are now, as I understand, considering the bill under the 10-minute rule?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The 10-minute rule prevails until 1 o'clock to-morrow afternoon.

Mr. TRAMMELL. If there is no amendment now pending——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is no amendment pending.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I desire to offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Florida will be stated.

The READING CLERK. On page 1, after line 2, it is proposed to strike out the first section of the bill, as follows:

That it is hereby declared in the public interest that conditions existing in those portions of the United States known particularly as the wheat areas resulting from the stimulation of wheat growing during the recent war and aggravated during subsequent years by low yields and high costs of production should be changed through the encouragement of a system of agriculture not dependent for its success upon wheat alone, but cultivation would include the raising of livestock, such as dairy and beef cattle, hogs, sheep, poultry, and the products thereof.

Mr. CURTIS. May I ask if the Senator's amendment is a motion to strike out?

Mr. TRAMMELL. My amendment proposes to strike out section 1 of the bill; that is the substance of the amendment.

Mr. President, my idea in offering the amendment is to try to shape the proposed legislation into such form that it will afford aid and relief to the farmers throughout the country who may be in a situation similar to that which is pictured as being the situation of the wheat farmers of the Northwest. I am always sympathetic with the interests of agriculture and of the farmers of our country, but I can not persuade myself to occupy a position of favoritism in behalf of a few farmers and at the same time close the door for aid to a far greater number of farmers who have suffered as much as have those in the three or four States of the Northwest, and deny to them the beneficent provisions contemplated to be enacted in the pending measure. That is the whole situation.

Mr. President, I do not think the man is any greater friend of the farmer who would contend that a few of them should have relief than is the man who, upon the other hand, contends that if we are going to assist the farmers we should be just and equitable and that we should aid all farmers who may occupy a similar unfortunate position. Some of our friends are inclined to argue here that because a Senator does not see their viewpoint of assisting a few farmers of the country and discriminating against the many farmers of the country he is not sympathetic toward the farmers and the agricultural interests.

I dare say that in any of the agricultural States of the Union there will be found about as many farmers who need assistance for the purpose of diversifying their crops as may be found in any one of the States of the Northwest for the benefit of whose farmers it is contemplated to vote the relief carried in the pending bill. For my part, I do not feel that the farmers of my State should be taxed for the purpose of raising money to assist farmers of another section when the proponents of the bill are not willing to extend the same privilege of a loan or an advance to the farmers of my State, even though they may be in a similar situation. I think my position is but similar to the attitude of a good many Senators who do not approve of this bill in its present form.

We are for all the farmers who need help that they may diversify their crops and not merely a few of them. Yesterday we sought to have an amendment written into the bill which would appropriate $25,000,000 to assist unfortunate farmers in other sections of the country, and yet those Senators who advocate the measure in its present form were responsible to a large extent for the defeat of that amendment.

Mr. President, the champions of this bill and of the policy it embraces turn their stony hearts to the millions of farmers in other sections of the country who are as unfortunate, who have suffered as much as a result of the misfortunes of war as have the few farmers within these three or four wheat-producing States and say to them, "We are only taking care of the favored few; you stand without the pale; you are not to be recognized." If those Senators take that position, how do they expect other Senators who are friendly to agriculture and to the farming interests to assist them in securing an appropriation of $50,000,000 in order to aid those few farmers? I think we should deal alike with all of the farmers who are equally unfortunate, and when we come to write a measure for the purpose of making advances and loans to the farming interests in order that diversification of crops may be instituted we should make the provisions of the measure broad enough to cover the situation in the different States.

Throughout my public career I have, in season and out of season, worked to promote the interests of agriculture. I am for the farmer; I am for the agricultural interests of the country; but in manifesting my love and my friendship for agriculture and for the farmers of the country I do not propose to tax a hundred farmers for the purpose of assisting one farmer. If the question is to be raised as to who is the farmer's friend and who is the friend of agriculture I say that the Senator who votes for the bill in its present form is opposing the interests of one hundred farmers to assist one farmer. I prefer being fair and just to all.

You who want this bill as it is now written, by your position say to the great majority of farmers: "You may be as unfortunate as those we favor; you may have suffered as the result of war; you may need funds with which to diversify your crop, but we are not going to allow these privileges to the farmers of New York, of Illinois, of Indiana, of Missouri, of California, of Texas, of Arkansas, of Georgia, of Florida, of Alabama, or of Mississippi, and many other States. You may have had similar misfortunes; you may need funds with which to diversify your crops, but we do not propose to let you have them. Your part in this game, Mr. Farmer, in these other States is to help pay the freight, to help raise the taxes, and to provide the funds in order to let these other farmers have $50,000,000."

I do not favor any such measure of discriminatory legislation. Unless the bill be so amended as to treat alike all farmers who are similarly situated, who have suffered the misfortunes of war, who have had their plantations devastated, who are suffering for those and other reasons, I shall vote against it; and I think the real friend of the farmer should vote against it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Florida has expired. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Florida.

The amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is still before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, and open to amendment.

Mr. BURSUM. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The PRINCIPAL CLERK. On page 7, after line 4, it is proposed to insert the following as a new section:

SEC. 7. For the purpose of stabilizing banks and trust companies in aid of agriculture, restoring public confidence within agricultural communities or States where such confidence has become impaired, there is hereby appropriated out of any funds in the Treasury the sum of $20,000,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to be used in the manner hereinafter provided and hereby made available until June 30, 1925.

SEC. 8. That the Comptroller of the Currency is hereby authorized to use the moneys so appropriated for the purpose of stabilizing banks and trust companies within agricultural districts, States, or communities wherein public confidence in such financial concerns has become impaired on account of conditions beyond their control—

a. In the making of loans or advances to solvent banks and trust companies whether or not members of the Federal reserve system, upon such terms, conditions, and security as he may deem proper in order to secure continued stability and operations of such banks and trust companies.

b. In the making of loans or advances in aid of the reopening of any bank or trust company closed during the year 1923 or subsequent thereto, whenever in the judgment of the comptroller such reopening is in the interest of the community to be served and can be accomplished upon a safe and solvent basis, such loans to be made upon such terms and conditions and upon such security as the comptroller may require.

c. In the deposit on demand or time in such unimpaired solvent banks or trust companies of such amounts as he may deem advisable in pursuance of the purposes of this act.

d. In the making of loans to stockholders upon adequate security for the purpose of repairing the impairment of capital stock of banks or trust companies.

SEC. 9. No loan, advance, or deposit shall be made for a term exceeding 12 months, but the comptroller may grant or accept renewals or extensions: Provided, That a complete liquidation shall be had upon all advances and loans within three years from the passage of this act; and no loan, advance, or deposit shall be made in the first instance later than March 31, 1925.

SEC. 10. No advance, deposit, or loan shall be made hereunder to any bank or trust company not a member of the Federal reserve system until such bank or trust company shall first agree to permit audits and investigations and submit to such rules and regulations as the Comptroller of the Currency may prescribe.

SEC. 11. The Comptroller of the Currency is hereby authorized to use of the moneys aforesaid an amount not exceeding $100,000 for expenses in carrying out the purposes of this act.

SEC. 12. No interest shall be charged or received by the comptroller in excess of the current rediscount rate of the Federal reserve bank of the district within which such loan is made on the date of such loan.

The loans and advances authorized under sections 7 to 12, inclusive, shall, when finally liquidated, together with interest collected, be repaid into the Treasury of the United States.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is upon the amendment offered by the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. BURSUM. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Fess	Lodge	Robinson
Bayard	Fletcher	McCormick	Sheppard
Broussard	Frazier	McKellar	Shields
Bruce	George	McKinley	Shipstead
Bursum	Gerry	McNary	Simmons

Colt	Harrison	Oddie	Stanfield
Copeland	Howell	Pepper	Swanson
Curtis	Johnson, Minn.	Phipps	Trammell
Dale	Kendrick	Ralston	Wadsworth
Dill	Keyes	Ransdell	Walsh, Mont.
Edge	Ladd	Reed, Pa.	Willis

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce that the Senator from Iowa [Mr. BROOKHART], the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES], the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. MOSES], the Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER], and the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST], are absent on business of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-two Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present. The question is upon the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. BURSUM].

Mr. BURSUM. Mr. President, the bill which is before the Senate I consider a good bill. This amendment, to my mind, will greatly improve the bill. It will do more toward rehabilitating agriculture than the provisions of the bill which have thus far been considered.

The recapturing of public confidence in the banking institutions of this country seems to me vital. It is vital not only to the depositors who are affected but to the financial system of this country. It is vital to the Federal reserve system. It is vital to our whole financial fabric, upon which are based the credits of the country. The lack of confidence, the distress, is not local. It is widespread. In my State there are probably 60,000 discontented men and women depositors of banks. Multiply that by three and you will have approximately 200,000 people affected out of less than half a million.

That situation does not apply solely to my State. It applies to most of the States west of the Mississippi River. The same condition may be said to exist in Montana, in Idaho, in portions of Washington, in portions of Oklahoma, the two Dakotas, portions of Minnesota, portions of Iowa, Kansas, Nebraska, Arizona, Colorado, and, indeed, it is a very widespread condition. So that, taking into account the number of failures and the number of depositors affected, I think it is safe to estimate that at least 2,000,000 people in this country are affected by the financial condition of the banks.

There are many reasons for the existence of that condition—a combination of reasons which date back to the war. Our system, which we have called the Federal reserve system, and of which almost all of the national banks are members and many State banks are also members, is made up of a three-cornered partnership—the Federal reserve system as the bank of discount, the banks of the country who take over the deposits, and, in the last analysis, the real owners of the moneys and of the capital upon which not only the banks but the Federal reserve system itself depends for its operations, the individual depositors.

It is a strange kind of a partnership. It is a sort of a lead-pipe cinch game, wherein one of the partners absorbs all of the profits while the other partners take the losses. In the last analysis, the depositor is the man who puts up the capital. The man who has nothing to say about the management of these institutions is the man who suffers the losses.

One reason for this, to my mind, is that the policy of the Federal reserve system has not been as broad as it should have been. It has not been as liberal as it might have been. The proposition of any institution making no provision for losses and absorbing nothing but profits is an unfair proposition.

For instance, during the war we had great inflations. The Federal reserve system profited by those inflations. The Federal reserve system did a tremendous business, and reaped a tremendous harvest. Large profits were taken. Out of those profits the Federal Government has received upward of $160,000,000. In addition to this, the Federal reserve system has built gilded palaces here and there, and expended a very large amount of money. On the other hand, many of the correspondent banks who are doing business with the Federal reserve system are now in distress because they were not in position to absorb the great deflations which were brought about subsequent to the war.

It is not a matter of bad banking or crooked bankers, as some would insinuate, but it is a condition caused by circumstances over which the banking institutions throughout the country had no control and against which they were unable to guard.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, I understood the Senator to remark that it is a condition throughout the country which the bankers are unable to control. Do I understand that his amendment applies to any bank in trouble in any part of the country?

Mr. BURSUM. It does apply in any part of the country. This is not a special provision.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will notify the junior Senator from New Mexico that his time has expired on the amendment.

Mr. BURSUM. I have not spoken on the bill yet.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has 10 minutes on the bill.

Mr. BURSUM. This amendment is not local; it is to apply to the whole country. It is by no means certain that all of the appropriation asked for would be used. Certainly it would not be used if it was not necessary that it be used, and it is proposed that it shall be handled by an agency in possession of an intelligent appraisal of the conditions of every bank in the country—the office of the Comptroller of the Currency.

I submit that there is no agency in possession of an intelligent appraisal of all of the assets of the banks, their necessities in their respective communities, and the possibility of reopening a bank upon a sound and solvent basis other than the office of the Comptroller of the Currency. If we can not trust the comptroller's office, which to-day is passing upon the solvency of banks and passing upon the securities, certifying those banks as being solvent, I do not know to what agency we may trust a matter of this kind.

The proposition that it is important and vital that confidence be restored I take it can not be controverted. Not only the banks of the country but the Federal reserve system, aye, the Government itself, must depend upon the confidence of the people, else we could not function, business could not function; and I say, Mr. President, that when people have deposited their earnings in a banking institution upon the faith that that institution belongs to a sound banking system, they have some rights. I know of instances in communities where half of the population, representing the wage earners, the toilers, the children of wage earners, are suffering to-day on account of the financial situation.

Other things have contributed to bring this situation about. The Treasury Department itself in financing and selling Treasury certificates, carrying on a campaign of solicitation, of propaganda, for the sale of Government certificates, has been the primary cause in many instances of the withdrawing of large numbers of time deposits from the banks throughout this country.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, does not the Senator understand—I am sure he does—that if this amendment should be adopted it would absolutely change the fundamental principle of the Government's relation to banking in this country?

Mr. BURSUM. Not at all. This is an emergency measure. It is a measure to take care of an existing emergency. It is proposed for the purpose of stabilizing the present situation, of recapturing the confidence of the public, which has been alienated over a wide area of country, a condition which, to my mind, is threatening the integrity of our whole financial system.

Mr. EDGE. Does not the Senator agree that if the amendment were adopted it would mean that if any bank, through unfortunate investments or on account of its capital being impaired, whatever the reasons might be, suffered loss, it would feel that it could come to the Government, through the comptroller's department, and in some way secure aid?

Mr. BURSUM. Not at all, unless there were individual security to make good the repairment. There would be no chance, otherwise, for any aid.

Mr. EDGE. Of course the amendment would be useless for the purpose for which the Senator is urging it unless money would be available to make up such losses.

Mr. BURSUM. Quite the reverse. It is true that the purpose is to make available money which can be loaned upon property which otherwise would not be liquid and would not be used as security on the public market for obtaining moneys in that regard and for that purpose.

Mr. EDGE. If there are liquid securities, there is reasonable banking opportunity to rehabilitate the capital and financial condition of a banking institution.

Mr. BURSUM. If a bank were in possession of liquid securities and the capital of the bank itself were unimpaired, of course that kind of an institution would not be in need of the relief; but many of these institutions might be relieved from the loss due to impairment, and the depositors thus saved. I am not so much concerned with the bankers. I have no particular concern for any individual banker, but the purpose of this is to save the institution itself in behalf of the depositors. The depositors have some rights. Whence does the Federal reserve bank derive its capital except from the depositors all over this country?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. BURSUM. I yield.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. We are informed that recently there has been formed a $10,000,000 so-called service-banking corporation.

Mr. BURSUM. Yes.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. And that the War Finance Corporation has promised to advance $100,000,000 of Government funds to that banking corporation.

Mr. BURSUM. Yes.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. We are also informed that the purpose of the formation of this banking corporation, which is to receive a hundred million dollars of Government funds, is to help out banking institutions in agricultural communities, and so help the farmer. I would like to ask the Senator from New Mexico if his banks could not get a part of that hundred million dollars?

Mr. BURSUM. No; nor could the banks in the Senator's State, for the purpose for which it is required. I can not conceive that any outside institution would concern itself with the proposition of repairing an impairment of a bank. They might be willing to purchase adequate securities, liquid securities. The purchase of securities from financial institutions which are impaired is of no assistance to that institution, nor is it any protection to the depositors. The only remedy which will help a banking institution and aid the depositors and make them safe is to repair the impairment. The ill with which that institution is affected must be cured or the money will do no good. There is no use loaning money to a bank if it is impaired. There must be new capital put into that bank, and that can only be done through securities furnished either by stockholders or by others who are willing to become stockholders and keep that concern going and in that way protect the rights and interests of the depositors. There is no other method.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Does the Senator mean to say that he believes this fund of $100,000,000 of Government money that is to be loaned to this banking corporation, which we are told is going to be used for the purpose of helping the farmer, will not be used for that purpose, but that it will be used to help him in the way in which he has always been helped?

Mr. BURSUM. Exactly, just that way. It will not help him at all except that they will purchase liquid securities, will buy good notes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator has expired.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I understand the colleague of the Senator who has just spoken, the senior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. JONES], desires to make a speech upon the pending amendment, and as he is not here, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and the Senate (at 5 o'clock p. m.) took a recess until to-morrow, Thursday, March 13, 1924, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, March 12, 1924.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Once more, O Lord, our soul utters its inner appeal for that reality which is found in Thee alone, and which is Thy living, loving presence. Amid the jar and the turbulence of the days bless us with that peace which the world can not give, neither can it take away. Give us ease from conscious reproach and rest from conscious fear. Revive in us the passion that leaves the things material, only to lose itself in things eternal. O let the light of Thy truth kindle all our desires and direct all our ways. Be merciful unto us our Father in heaven, until we say "good night" here and "good morrow" yonder. In the name of Jesus. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to address the House for two minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, a House subcommittee of which I am a member is now investigating law enforcement in the District of Columbia.

Three of the Washington newspapers the other day carried an article to the effect that a man was arrested near the House Office Building with a jug of whisky and stating that he claimed he was an employee of the House Office Building and had procured the whisky for and was taking it to a Congressman. Our committee had the officers who made that arrest, together with the man himself, put under oath and interrogated. The officers testified that no such thing occurred. The man was not arrested near the House Office Building, as alleged in the newspapers, but was arrested in another part of town from the Capitol, in an alley on the other side of the Government Printing Office. He did not claim he was taking whisky to a Congressman. He did not claim to be an employee of the House Office Building or that he was going there. No such claim was made. He was not an employee in the House Office Building but used to be several years ago for about a year, being then detailed there by the Government Printing Office. He has not been an employee here for more than a year, and he made no such claim to the officers. At the time he was arrested he was drunk. The policeman told him he had been drinking for several days and asked him why he persisted in getting this whisky. He said he got it for himself and bought it in an alley from a bootlegger. There was no basis or grounds whatever for said newspapers to allege that when he was arrested he claimed to be employed in the House Office Building and was taking whisky to a Congressman, for he made no such claims. After the committee had ascertained these facts from the sworn testimony of the officers themselves we find the morning Herald, notwithstanding all these facts, coming out and reiterating the statement that this man when he was arrested said he was carrying whisky to a Congressman in the House Office Building. I take it the Washington newspapers ought to be more careful in the future about alleging facts concerning such matters when no such facts exist.

CORRECTION.

Mr. GLATFELTER. Mr. Speaker, I had a pair with the gentleman from New Jersey, Mr. SEGER, which I thought was good only from Friday until Monday. I therefore voted on Monday. I find I was mistaken about it, and I desire to change my vote and vote "present."

The SPEAKER. Of course, it is too late to change the vote, but the gentleman's explanation will go in the RECORD.

COTTON PRODUCTION.

Mr. BELL. Mr. Speaker, while visiting the farm of Mr. C. C. Wall last November in Gwinnett County, Ga., he gave me in detail his experience in destroying boll weevils, and was generous enough to give me the remedy, as well as the method of application and instructions in cultivating the land under boll-weevil conditions. The following is the solution he says he uses with success:

Four pounds of calcium arsenate, 2 gallons black molasses. Dissolve in 2 gallons of boiling water, then add 6 gallons of cold water.

PREPARATION OF LAND.

Turn land early and plow under all stubble and everything left on the land from former crop. About April 1 bed land out and out, leaving a good water furrow. Allow plenty of space between cotton rows. On or about April 10, 15, or 20 plant cottonseed on bed, first using guano 9–3–3, or a better grade if convenient. Use 400 pounds per acre, and follow the distributer with a spring-tooth harrow; follow harrow with a Cole planter, putting one and a half bushels of good seed per acre. When cotton comes up use a spring-tooth harrow with snake-head center teeth. In five to seven days after harrowing bar off with 3-inch plow and fender, then chop, leaving a good stand of cotton. Within 10 days thereafter put in the furrow 50 pounds of nitrate soda per acre (preferably by hand), then plow with 16-inch scrape, increasing the size of scrape 2 inches at each plowing up to 22 inches. Plow every 10 days, or as nearly so as possible, until the 1st or 10th of August. Do not plow deep after you have barred the cotton off. Keep middle of rows well plowed. Use solution with small cotton mop and stir frequently while using. Put but one or two drops of solution in the bud and apply only to the bud or buds of limbs of the plant. Do not smear the solution on the stalks or the leaves. Begin applying solution when cotton is chopped and apply every 10 days until migration ends in August. Only hard rain will wash solution off the plant, and if this should occur reapply immediately.

POSTAL SERVICE.

Mr. O'SULLIVAN. Mr. Speaker, of all the agencies of government, none has a more comprehensive program nor effects a closer contact with the individual than the Postal Service. Each day sees a veritable army of men and women engaged in the vast work of this department. It is a most embracing service; it is the greatest public utility in the world. It transports intelligence by correspondence, newspaper, and magazine; it transmits money from place to place through the feature of its money-order department; it acts as banker for those who wish to deposit their money in its keeping. Its program has become so diversified and involves the daily routine of the citizen to such an extent that the slightest disturbance in its efficiency awakens deep concern in the American public.

Its vital importance to business and to the individual has been recognized from its establishment. Innumerable instrumentalities which make for the betterment of the service have constantly been put into operation. Everything to effect a saving of time in transporting and delivering mail has been sought. The stage coach gave way to its speedier rival, the railroad; the horse has been replaced by the motor truck. The airplane has been utilized, while even the ground below has been put to practical use, as pneumatic tubes in our large cities are now carrying mail matter from place to place, all in the interest of time.

How thoroughly this department has the support and confidence of the people can best be illustrated by its growth. When its fiscal year ended in 1800 the sum of its receipts was $280,804; during the past fiscal year its receipts were $532,827,925, a magnificent demonstration of the use to which the American public puts this utility. Each day over 51,000 post offices throw open their doors, 60,000 assistant postmasters and clerks get ready for business, 40,000 city carriers throw on their mail pouches, 44,000 rural carriers hitch up Dobbin or get "Henry" out of the stall, and innumerable other employees assume their respective places of work, all bent on giving service to the public. On all sides are instances of growth, many of which are so staggering in magnitude as to be almost unbelievable. Witness such an example as that of Los Angeles within the past 40 years. Then its receipts were $60,000. To-day they are $6,000,000. By way of passing note, it might be mentioned that the greatest mushroom growth of any post office fell to the lot of a fourth-class post office in Arkansas. In three months of 1922 its business increased over 1,000 per cent, which caused the postmaster to wire to Washington the following telegram: "Office out of my control; letters arriving 5,000 to 7,000 a day; parcel post by the ton; can not open mail any longer; no place to put it; accept resignation." This, of course, was due to the discovery of oil in the vicinity. As an incident, its value is merely to show the instantaneous manner in which Postal Service follows business, even into Arkansas.

The other branches of the Postal Service have witnessed developments quite in keeping with the mail-service growth. Take the money-order business: established under Lincoln, it transmitted during its first year $1,300,000; to-day it handles $1,300,000,000.

This same service boasts of being the largest savings institution in the world. While the branch having charge of this feature of the service is comparatively young, it is worthy to note that at the present there are deposits of $131,000,000 to the credit of the public.

Such is the background for and some of the high lights of the Postal Service. Due credit for the sound position where this service finds itself must be given to those who have guided and directed its activities. But in passing out credit and giving praise, it should not be forgotten that something more than three cheers should be given to the men and women who have actually done the work; to the postal clerk, the carrier, both in the city and in the rural districts, and to the railroad postal employee. All the directing genius in the world would be unavailing unless there was loyalty of service and efficiency of performance on the part of those who actually handle the mail and the money that travels from place to place. The capacity of these employees to take on new work is phenomenal. This has been demonstrated time after time, without a proportional increase in the force or the established facilities. Witness the assimilation of the parcel-post business with the mails and its successful handling, notwithstanding its growth. The chief reason for this lies in the spirit of the personnel of the organization, which is preeminently one of service. It can be accounted for in no other manner.

Says the Postmaster General in his latest report:

> The growth of postal receipts, representing in a fair measure the increase in the volume of business transacted at the post offices where clerks and carriers are employed, has steadily increased with a greater percentage than in the increase of clerks and carriers. This has steadily reduced the margin between the volume of business transacted and the volume that may be handled without increase in force. The Postal Service has been noted for its ability to take on new business and assimilate it with the old without a proportional increase in force and facilities employed.

During the past year the increase in receipts, indicative of the volume of business, was 9.89 per cent over the previous year, whereas the increase in the number of clerks was 2.06 per cent and that of the carriers was 1.64 per cent over the preceding year.

I can recall the time when employment in the Postal Service was deemed exceedingly attractive. Positions were sought by men of a type that any employer might well be proud of, men with characteristics of ambition, efficiency, and honesty. Theirs were the hands that built up this great postal structure. The fact that the salaries attracted the right type of men can not be overlooked as one of the real causes of success in the Postal Service endeavors.

As what a man receives for what he gives is a determining factor in all employment, it must be admitted that attractiveness of the postal positions has been greatly dimmed. This country can not afford to permit such a policy to continue. In justice to the present employees, and in equal justice to the efficiency of the service, we can not pass unheeded these men who ask for an increase in their salaries and a rectification of some of the ills existing under the present laws which govern their action while in the service and at their retirement.

I want every man in the Postal Service to have a wage which will insure him—

1. Comfortable living quarters.
2. Good, healthful food, and occasionally some delicacies.
3. Enough good clothes for most purposes.
4. The chance for the wife to buy enough mechanical and physical aid to relieve housework of much of its drudgery.
5. The means to buy books, go to the theater, and give the children an adequate education.
6. At least a limited amount of recreation.
7. Some insurance and a little fund for savings.

Manifestly the present wage of these men is not sufficient to meet these needs. If it is the intention of this Government to hire cheap labor, that is one thing, but if it wishes to retain the services of men of the standard necessary to conduct properly the great business of the department it must provide a higher wage. If this Congress wishes to do an injustice to these men, it can do it very readily by failing to grant an increase in salaries. But let no one forget that such a policy will lead to a deterioration in the Postal Service. It is true that many of the older men will remain; they have given the best part of their lives to the work of the department, and because of their age some might have difficulty in obtaining other employment. But the younger men will have no hesitation in seeking places which provide more liberally than does the Government, and the type of those who will seek their places will not tend to the betterment of this all-important department.

Now comes the statement from the White House that President Coolidge is opposed to any increase for these employees, because the condition of the country will not warrant it. And in the same statement he expressly acknowledges the justice of the claim for an increase. It seems like a wholly untenable position he occupies. How can the Chief Executive admit that an increase is justly due, yet use the might of his office to prevent it? Never before has a President pursued such a course. Nor do I believe this Congress will follow him. Respect for a living wage and a desire to maintain the high standard of the Postal Service must govern our action. As far as I am concerned, they will.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. It is evident there is no quorum present.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

The Clerk called the roll, when the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The SPEAKER. Three hundred and sixty Members have answered to their names; a quorum is present.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

ALLEGED CHARGES AGAINST TWO MEMBERS OF CONGRESS.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following privileged resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee offers a privileged resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 217.

Whereas a grand jury of the District Court of the United States for the Northern District of Illinois, southern division, impaneled at the February term, 1924, has reported to that court that certain evidence has been submitted to them involving the payment of money to two Members of Congress; and

Whereas the honor and dignity of the Congress require that the facts be immediately ascertained, to the end that such action as is essential for the Congress itself to take may be promptly taken: Therefore be it

Resolved, That a select committee of five Members of the House shall be appointed by the Speaker thereof whose duty it shall be to proceed forthwith to make an investigation of such allegation and ascertain—

(a) Whether said "two Members of Congress" so charged are Members of the House of Representatives; and

(b) If so, to make such further investigation as may be essential to establish the truth or falsity of said allegation.

Said committee shall have power to send for persons and papers and administer oaths and shall be permitted to sit during the sessions of the House and any recess thereof and at such place or places as may be necessary to discharge the duties herein imposed.

Resolved further, That the Speaker is hereby authorized to issue subpœnas to witness upon the request of the committee or any subcommittee thereof at any time, including any recess of the Congress; and the Sergeant at Arms is hereby empowered and directed to serve all subpœnas and other processes put into his hands by said committee or any subcommittee thereof.

Resolved further, That said committee shall report to the House as promptly as possible the results of its inquiries together with such recommendations as it may deem advisable.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, there is a typographical error which should be corrected. In line 11, on page 2, the words "to witness" should be changed to "witnesses."

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the correction will be made.

There was no objection.

Mr. BEGG. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that this is not a privileged resolution at this time.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. BEGG. I appreciate, Mr. Chairman, that the Chair made a ruling last night on this point, but I desire to make the point again and call the attention of the Speaker to one or two points, namely, the only thing that gives this a privileged status is that the honor of the House is involved. This is the third morning that this subject matter, under the guise of being a privileged resolution, has been before this body. The first time, a resolution taking cognizance of the action of the grand jury was acted upon and disposed of by the House, and when the reply to that resolution was received, again privileged status was given to the report and the action of the House on that report was to send the report to the Judiciary Committee for disposition. Disposition was made by the Judiciary Committee, and yesterday again the privileged status of their report was brought into the House under the guise that the honor of this body was involved and therefore their report became privileged. Now, again, this morning another gentleman, the distinguished leader of the minority, comes in with a resolution dealing with a subject matter identical that has been three times before this body under the guise of being privileged.

I suggest to the Speaker that if this is held privileged this morning again, regardless of the disposition of this matter I can bring in a resolution to-morrow morning appointing a special committee of three Members instead of five and under the same argument, that the honor of the House is involved because a grand jury in Chicago referred to two Members having been paid money, and following the line of precedents the Chair can not rule me out.

If that conclusion be true that this resolution this morning, because it specifies a little different way of disposing of that privileged status of a resolution, then I, by finding a little different way again, can claim a privilege for another resolution, and that could be carried on indefinitely. In other words, every single morning, until a final adjudication of the question of the honor of this House can be had, there could be a privileged resolution brought in, a little different from the one the day before.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BEGG. In just a moment. There must come a time somewhere when we can end the privilege of this House in dealing with a specific performance. I make the point of order that that time has come now, after three different considerations of the same specific violation of the honor of the House. I yield to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. BANKHEAD. As I understand the gentleman's argument, his point of order is made solely upon the proposition that the offering of this resolution this morning is a dilatory proceeding.

Mr. BEGG. I did not make any such point of order.

Mr. BANKHEAD. But that is the effect of it.

Mr. BEGG. I think the Speaker understands clearly what my point of order is.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is ready to rule. The Chair recognizes that there is great force in the argument made by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BEGG]. The Chair thinks the gentleman is correct in the logic of the situation that there must be an end sometime to the privilege of such a matter. It could not be allowed in a House which is here to do business that such a question of the privilege of the House should have a new right to consideration indefinitely from day to day. When the question was raised last evening by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON] the Chair is disposed to think now that the Chair might well then have ruled that inasmuch as the whole subject had been before the House and had been referred by the House to one of the standing committees and that committee had reported and the House had acted upon the report, the right of privilege had been exhausted. However, the Chair is confronted with this personal embarrassment.

Last night the Chair overruled the point of order made by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON], which is the same as that now made more elaborately by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BEGG]. The gentleman from Michigan did not then argue the question. It was a new question to the Chair; and the Chair, acting upon the first-blush opinion that the subject was still privileged, overruled the point of order. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] expressly asked the Chair if he held that it would be in order to-day, and the Chair said that he did so hold. Under those circumstances, whatever the Chair may now think, having once ruled and assured the gentleman that it would be in order to-day, the Chair feels that to deal fairly with the House, and particularly with the gentleman from Tennessee, he must be bound by that ruling. Yet, notwithstanding that ruling which he made yesterday and which he now reaffirms, the Chair wishes to state that in the future he will not feel bound by this precedent. The Chair therefore overrules the point of order.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I stated yesterday afternoon when the resolution was presented that I would be willing to present it again to-day and have a vote upon it without debate. That was my feeling at that time, and that is my feeling now. So far as I am concerned, I am ready for a vote; but it has been suggested to me by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH], the majority leader, that he desires to discuss the matter for a little while.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I should be very glad if the gentleman from Tennessee would yield me 10 minutes. I think that is all I shall ask.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman from Ohio 10 minutes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Speaker, yesterday after a prolonged and exhaustive debate the House adopted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the House take no further action for the present to procure from the Attorney General the information heretofore requested of the Attorney General under House Resolution No. 211.

That was the resolution submitted by the Committee on the Judiciary. Subsequently that was amended on the floor as follows:

Resolved, That in view of its extreme importance to the House the Attorney General be, and is hereby, requested to proceed at once and give preference and precedence to this investigation and report the results to this House.

In other words, not content with saying merely that in the opinion of the House it should not undertake an investigation independently for the present at least we went further and gave specific instructions to the Attorney General, leaving all other things aside, to proceed to the speedy determination of the case. Under those circumstances does it not seem to be unwise, after giving those specific instructions, to now undertake by a committee to do those very things that we have instructed the Attorney General to do at once? Could it result in anything else than delay? It is inconceivable that a committee of this House and the Department of Justice proceeding independently could each examine into this case. In the first place, this committee will have to take entire possession of all of the evidence now in the Department of Justice. It would have to examine the witnesses that the Department of Justice would call upon. It could accomplish nothing in the world except to cause delay and confusion. The Department of Justice must proceed at once, and must report the result of its investigations to the House. That is what we ordered it to do yesterday by resolution.

Mr. WEFALD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Yes.

Mr. WEFALD. What is the gentleman's opinion of what a reasonable time would be within which the Attorney General should make a report to the House?

Mr. LONGWORTH. It would be impossible for me to say offhand, but I say this: That so far as I am personally concerned, if within two weeks from to-day we do not have something definite in this unfortunate affair from the Department of Justice, I for one am willing to vote for some such resolution as that now offered by the gentleman from Tennessee [applause], but I am not willing to do that now. It can not benefit the House to do so at this time, and it certainly can not benefit the two gentlemen whose names have been mentioned in this affair.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Yesterday the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MONTAGUE] made an elaborate speech about the importance of keeping separate the three departments of the Government. What power has the House of Representatives to instruct the Attorney General of the United States or the Department of Justice in the performance of its official duties? The Attorney General can disregard it and pay no attention to it whatever, and therefore what we passed yesterday amounts to nothing, so far as being obligatory is concerned.

Mr. LONGWORTH. At least it is using moral suasion.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. It amounts to nothing at all. Let me ask this question of the gentleman: The House itself proposes to do nothing, although the honor of every Member of the House is impugned. We propose to leave it all to Mr. Daugherty, the Attorney General. Suppose Mr. Daugherty at the end of two weeks, the period just mentioned by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH], reports that there is nothing in the case?

Then there will be no evidence to show what he did, what Mr. Crim did, the man who denounced his own witnesses yesterday; there will be no evidence to show whether the House has done anything or he has done anything. All he does will be kept secret under the law, and then what is the position of this House, every one of us having our honor impugned?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I think the gentleman approaches the question from the wrong point of view. The only reason why we have a right to demand from the Department of Justice the evidence that it has is under our constitutional power to punish or expel our Members. It is not to approve anything that any Member of the House has done. It is to disapprove what he has done. Now, I am not willing to assume that we are asking this information for the purpose of punishing our Members. I repeat as I said yesterday, I have absolute and complete confidence in the integrity of both of the gentlemen named, and I have no idea the House will be called upon to punish them.

Mr. STEVENSON. Will the gentleman yield now?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I will.

Mr. STEVENSON. The gentleman says he would be willing in two weeks to vote for a resolution like this. Under the ruling the Chair has just made this is the last time this resolution would be privileged. Now, is the gentleman prepared to provide a method by which it would be privileged if we should decide to take it up again?

Mr. LONGWORTH. If the gentleman will take his rule book, if he has such a thing, and read the rules, he would find out how it would be possible to bring it before the House.

Mr. STEVENSON. I am entirely familiar with that; but will the gentleman assist us in bringing it before the House according to its rules?

Mr. LONGWORTH. There is no difficulty in the world in bringing such a resolution before the House. It can be referred to the Committee on Rules at once and reported. If the gentleman was more familiar with the rules, perhaps he would not ask the question.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Would the gentleman be willing to ascertain whether the minority leader would be willing to postpone action on this resolution for two weeks and for it to retain its present status?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I think, gentlemen, such action as the gentleman from Tennessee now contemplates, while I know that his only motive is to protect the honor and dignity of the House, is illy advised at this time. I think no good can come from it either to the membership of the House or to the individual Members named. [Applause.]

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask, before I begin, if there is any other gentleman, now that debate is pending, who wants time in opposition to the resolution; if not, it is my purpose at the conclusion of what I have to say to move the previous question. If there is anyone who wants time in opposition, I would be glad for him to take it now. [Cries of "Vote!"]

Mr. Speaker, I wish to get clearly before the House, if I can, the thought which is in my mind concerning this resolution. This resolution, except as to the "whereas," is an exact duplication of that which I introduced, I think, on Tuesday last, yesterday a week.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. If the gentleman will permit an inquiry?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I will.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I notice in reading the resolution it has no provision such as is ordinarily carried for the payment of the expenses of such committee out of the contingent fund. Did the gentleman do that intentionally?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The gentleman will recall that that would defeat its privileged character. Then it would have to go to the Committee on Accounts.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I had not thought of that.

SEVERAL MEMBERS. Read the rules.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. At the time the original resolution was introduced by me I had never heard an intimation of the name of a Member of the House. I had no idea whether the grand jury report, which, so far as I then knew, was merely an alleged report, had reference to Members of this body or Members of the Senate. Hence the first thing which this select committee was directed to ascertain was "whether said two Members of Congress so charged are Members of the House of Representatives," and if so, then to proceed further, of course the theory being that if they were found not to be Members of this body, then this body would cease to consider the matter further.

There has never been the slightest party idea in my mind. I have not the slightest personal or party interest in the passage of this resolution, but I am convinced that it is the duty of this House, under the constitutional status which it has and under the conditions which now prevail, of itself to make the investigation in regard to itself.

Mr. BEGG. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I will.

Mr. BEGG. Supposing that the resolution would pass and that the committee would be appointed. The minimum time in which they could be really at work would be probably a week. Now, let us suppose that within 10 days the grand jury actually begins the investigation of this particular phase of that report. Would we not only be spending useless money but would it not be rather ludicrous? If the grand jury is dilatory in starting then we would be justified; and it would seem to me if the grand jury makes a finding of fact and sustains it and should report, we are again justified in getting to the facts; but until we know the grand jury is being dilatory, does not the gentleman think that a reasonable time should elapse so as to give them a chance to start?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I think the difference between the gentleman from Ohio and myself is this: He is willing to submit to a grand jury an investigation in regard to the honor and dignity of the House to the exclusion of the House itself doing anything. There is nothing in this resolution now that will prevent the Department of Justice from proceeding if it chooses to proceed, but I am unwilling to say that we ourselves of ourselves can not investigate ourselves and must submit our honor and dignity to the keeping of a grand jury. [Applause.]

Mr. BEGG. Will the gentleman yield for a further question?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I will.

Mr. BEGG. The gentleman is in error when he states that the gentleman from Ohio would prefer to have the Department of Justice investigate the honor and dignity of the House; that is not my position at all.

I maintain that the honor of the House is not at stake until the fact is developed. Now, if we had no machinery to ascertain the criminality, then the case would be otherwise; but we have the machinery to punish crime, and this House does not undertake to punish crime; it only undertakes to vindicate itself after it has been sinned against.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Quite right; and if any one of its Members has been guilty of violating the honor of the House, of course to deal peremptorily with him. Now, this resolution, my colleagues, is not designed either to persecute or to protect Members.

Mr. HERSEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I yield.

Mr. HERSEY. Suppose this resolution that you have before you should pass this House. Would it not automatically stop at once the use of the evidence now in the hands of the Department of Justice, that we want and need under that resolution—automatically stop the prosecution by the Department of Justice of any charge that we have in that grand jury now being investigated and now in the hands of the Department of Justice?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Every gentleman, as I recall, who is a member of the great committee of which the gentleman from Maine is such a distinguished member, who discussed that question yesterday, who touched directly upon that proposition that the gentleman is now discussing, specifically assured us that the appointment of a special committee would not interfere with the procedure in the Department of Justice.

Mr. HERSEY. Did a member of the committee discuss that?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. As I recall the discussion, and especially that part of it in which I participated, we referred to a paragraph which a distinguished Democrat, member of the Committee on the Judiciary, caused to be inserted, which recited that under the circumstances, if a committee were appointed, if the House proceeded, that then the Attorney General would rest and not do anything, out of ethical consideration for the House proceedings. That was distinctly admitted by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS] as the only reason why the appointment of a committee was opposed—because it would prevent the Department of Justice from going on. If the Attorney General said that was his plan, we have no power to change his opinion or his decision.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. My recollection is that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS]—and if the gentleman is present he will correct me if I am in error—stated repeatedly in the course of his argument that there was no reason why the appointment of a special committee should at any time interfere with the action of the Department of Justice. The substance of the argument of the gentleman from Texas was that we ought not, by again calling upon the Attorney General to furnish the names and the nature of the charges, to give him an excuse for not proceeding further.

Mr. BEGG. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I do not want to use more time than I yielded to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. BEGG. I ask the privilege of bringing out one more point. I shall not use more time.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I yield.

Mr. BEGG. And it is on the question of the defense of the honor of the House. Is the gentleman's position this: That every time there comes a rumor quite generally circulated about the action of any Member, which if true would tend to violate the honor of the House, is it the gentleman's position that every time that rumor comes about he wants a special committee appointed to investigate it before the ascertainment of the facts in the court?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. No; that is not my position; and I never would have introduced this resolution if it had been predicated alone on newspaper reports. I think we have had too much of that in the past.

Mr. BEGG. I agree with the gentleman on that.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. But this report in the newspapers was predicated upon the report of the grand jury.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I yield.

Mr. BLANTON. I take it that if this subcommittee is appointed, to get a starting point the first step would be to go to the Attorney General and get what information he has. I presume that would be the starting point. Would not that violate the position, which impressed me very much yesterday, taken by my colleague from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS]? He said it would give the Attorney General an excuse for lying down on the proper prosecution of the cases. Now, if we appoint a special committee and the committee sees fit to have the Attorney General bring to that committee his papers or information, would we not in effect be giving him the same excuse to which the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS] referred?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Texas did not say that the appointment of a special committee——

Mr. BLANTON. I did not say that.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. What he said was that if we insisted upon calling for the names, the Attorney General would make that an excuse for ceasing the operations. This is not asking for the names, nor is it necessary for them to go to the Attorney General's office to begin.

Mr. BLANTON. But they could do that if we appointed them.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. This committee could, but whether it would or not I could not say.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. RANKIN. With reference to the statement made by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS] yesterday, which is found on page 4116 of the RECORD, he uses this language:

> Use your heads. This House has the power to appoint a special committee if it wants to, to go to the bottom of this thing. The Attorney General's office is not the only source of information.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for another quotation on that point?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Let me say this before gentlemen press me further upon this matter: I agreed with the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] that I would yield to him as much time as I have used. I want to keep that promise to him. I think now that I have used more time than the gentleman used.

Mr. HASTINGS. The exact question was asked later on of Mr. SUMNERS——

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I would like to keep faith with the gentleman from Ohio on that matter. I want to make just this further observation, that while the original resolution was adopted without the slightest intimation of a name—and I had no more idea as to what Members might possibly be involved than did the man in the moon—yet that which has occurred since reinforces my opinion that there should be a special committee.

And that is predicated upon the fact that the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. LANGLEY] and the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. ZIHLMAN] have themselves risen and stated they understood their names were being used and have themselves virtually demanded of this body that there be created a forum in which there might be a speedy determination of the facts in so far as those facts related to their official duties and their official integrity as Members of the Congress of the United States. [Applause.]

While I believe we are independent of their appeal, yet as a protection to the House itself and as a preservation of its own dignity and of its own constitutional rights I think we should create a committee which need not interfere with the Department of Justice. In addition to that I believe we now owe it to those gentlemen to have this special committee created. I believe the resolution should prevail, and Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the adoption of the resolution. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee moves the previous question on the resolution.

The previous question was ordered.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I move to refer the resolution to the Committee on Rules.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the previous question has been ordered.

The SPEAKER. A Member can always move to commit.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I could not make the motion until the gentleman had moved the previous question and the previous question had been ordered. That is the proper time for such a motion.

The SPEAKER. The rule specifically provides that—

> It shall be in order, pending the motion for or after the previous question shall have been ordered on its passage, for the Speaker to entertain and submit a motion to commit, with or without instructions.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I have not that rule before me, but does that apply to a House resolution as well as to joint resolutions and bills?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is informed that—

> When the previous question has been ordered on a simple resolution (as distinguished from a joint resolution) and a pending amendment, the motion to commit should be made after the vote on the amendment.

So the Chair thinks it applies to everything.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Is the motion of the gentleman from Ohio debatable?

The SPEAKER. It is not. The previous question has been ordered.

The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Ohio to commit the resolution to the Committee on Rules.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee) there were—ayes 148, noes 182.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 158, nays 197, answered "present" 2, not voting 74, as follows:

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. The question is now on the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

CHARGES AGAINST MEMBERS OF CONGRESS.

Mr. HERSEY. Under permission to-day to extend my remarks, I wish to say further that yesterday this House passed and sent to the Attorney General the following resolution:

Resolved, That the House take no further action for the present to procure from the Attorney General the information heretofore requested of the Attorney General by the House under House Resolution 211.

Resolved further, That in view of its extreme importance to the House, the Attorney General be, and is hereby, requested to proceed at once and give preference and precedence to this investigation and report the results to this House.

To-day we are attempting to pass the following inconsistent and antagonistic resolution:

Whereas a grand jury of the District Court of the United States for the Northern District of Illinois, southern division, impaneled at the February term, 1924, has reported to that court that certain evidence has been submitted to them involving the payment of money to two Members of Congress;

Whereas the honor and dignity of the Congress require that the facts be immediately ascertained, to the end that such action as is essential for the Congress itself to take, may be promptly taken: Therefore be it

Resolved, That a select committee of five Members of the House shall be appointed by the Speaker thereof whose duty it shall be to proceed forthwith to make an investigation of such allegation and ascertain—

(a) Whether said "two Members of Congress" so charged are Members of the House of Representatives; and

(b) If so, to make such further investigation as may be essential to establish the truth or falsity of said allegation.

Said committee shall have power to send for persons and papers and administer oaths and shall be permitted to sit during the sessions of the House and any recess thereof and at such place or places as may be necessary to discharge the duties herein imposed.

Resolved further, That the Speaker is hereby authorized to issue subpœnas to witnesses upon the request of the committee or any subcommittee thereof at any time, including any recess of the Congress; and the Sergeant at Arms is hereby empowered and directed to serve all subpœnas and other processes put into his hands by said committee or any subcommittee thereof.

Resolved further, That said committee shall report to the House as promptly as possible the results of its inquiries, together with such recommendations as it may deem advisable.

Yesterday the Attorney General was requested to proceed at once with the investigation and to give precedence to this investigation and report the results to this House. To-day the matter is in the hands of the Attorney General and the Department of Justice before the grand jury with full power to use the whole machinery of the Department of Justice in finding out the truth, vindicating the good name of this House if possible, and if the evidence warrants it, to punish anyone that is found guilty.

To-day we are asked to appoint a committee of five from the Members of this House who shall have power to take absolute charge of this same matter, empowered to send for persons and papers, administer oaths, and sit during sessions of the House and any recess thereof at such place or places as may be necessary to discharge the duties imposed. And, further, that the Speaker of the House is authorized to issue subpœnas to witnesses, Sergeant at Arms to serve them, and that the committee shall report to the House as promptly as possible the results of its investigation, with any recommendation it deems advisable.

Now while the evidence in this case is before the grand jury in the hands of the Department of Justice with instructions to proceed with that evidence in the usual and customary and lawful manner provided by the courts and the Constitution, we are asked to create a new tribunal that lacks the power of a grand jury and the resources of the Department of Justice. Any report from such a committee must be incomplete and unsatisfactory.

If this committee in face of the vote of yesterday by this House should demand of the Attorney General the evidence in his possession and before the grand jury that the committee may consider the evidence and that evidence is turned over to a House committee then the Attorney General ought to be impeached and removed from office.

There are those around me who claim to be friends of the Members accused who say they want to do the best thing for their friends and they are voting for this new resolution for the appointment of his new tribunal, this committee of five, under the plea that they are friends of the accused. I say in closing as I said in the beginning, if we do this out of friendship for our Members then our prayer still ought to be, "God save me from my friends."

CALENDAR WEDNESDAY.

The SPEAKER. To-day is Calendar Wednesday. The Clerk will call the roll of committees.

INCREASE OF COAST GUARD FOR LAW ENFORCEMENT.

Mr. WINSLOW (when the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce was called). Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 6815) to authorize a temporary increase of the Coast Guard for law enforcement.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman calls up the bill, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. This bill is on the Union Calendar. The House will automatically resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 6815) to authorize a temporary increase of the Coast Guard for law enforcement.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 6815, with Mr. MADDEN in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of H. R. 6815, to authorize a temporary increase of the Coast Guard for law enforcement.

Mr. WINSLOW. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I think the bill ought to be read for the information of the committee, and I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill.

The Clerk read the bill as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Navy is authorized to transfer to the Department of the Treasury, for the use of the Coast Guard, such vessels of the Navy, with their outfits and armaments, as can be spared by the Navy and as are adapted to the use of the Coast Guard.

SEC. 2. (a) The President is authorized to appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, the following temporary officers of the Coast Guard: Two captains, 13 commanders, 25 lieutenant commanders, 48 lieutenants, and 42 lieutenants (junior grade) and ensigns, of the line; and 1 commander, 11 lieutenant commanders, 19 lieutenants, and 40 lieutenants (junior grade) and ensigns, of the Engineer Corps.

(b) Such temporary officers while in service shall receive the same pay, allowances, and benefits as permanent commissioned officers of the Coast Guard of corresponding grade and length of service, except that no such officer shall be entitled to retirement because of his temporary commission.

(c) Temporary appointments shall continue until the President otherwise directs or Congress otherwise provides.

SEC. 3. Permanent commissioned officers of the Coast Guard may be given temporary promotion, in order of seniority and without examination, to fill any such temporary grades. Notwithstanding such temporary promotion, any such officer shall continue to hold his permanent commission and shall be advanced in lineal rank, promoted, and retired in the same manner as though this act had not become law.

SEC. 4. (a) All original temporary appointments under this act shall be made in grades not above that of lieutenant, in the line or the Engineer Corps, and shall be made only after the candidate has satisfactorily passed such examinations as the President may prescribe. No person shall be given an original temporary appointment who is more than 40 years of age.

(b) The names of all persons appointed under this section shall be placed upon a special list of temporary officers, as distinguished from the list of permanent officers, of the Coast Guard. The President is authorized, without regard to length of service or seniority, to promote to grades not above lieutenant, in the line or Engineer Corps, or to reduce officers on such special list, within the number specified for each grade, and he may, in his discretion, call for the resignation of, or dismiss, any such officer for unfitness or misconduct.

SEC. 5. (a) Under such regulations as he may prescribe, the President is authorized to appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, 25 temporary chief warrant officers of the Coast Guard from the permanent list of warrant officers of the Coast Guard.

(b) Such chief warrant officers shall receive the same pay, allowances, and benefits as commissioned warrant officers of the Navy, except that any such officer shall continue to hold his permanent grade, and shall be retired in the same manner as though this act had not become law.

SEC. 6. Under such regulations as he may prescribe, the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to appoint temporary warrant officers, and to make special temporary enlistments, in the Coast Guard. No person shall be entitled to retirement because of his temporary appointment or enlistment under this section.

SEC. 7. Nothing contained in this act shall operate to reduce the grade, rank, pay, allowances, or benefits that any person in the Coast Guard would have been entitled to if this act had not become law.

Mr. HILL of Maryland. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to this bill on the minority side, and I ask for recognition in opposition to the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that under the rule the right to recognition in opposition to the bill would go to a member of the committee if there were a member of the committee opposed to the bill. The Chair would like to ask whether there is any member of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce opposed to the bill and wishes recognition in opposition to it.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, if not, I claim recognition.

Mr. HILL of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, I also rose to ask recognition in opposition to the bill. I would like to ask whether the gentleman from Texas proposes to vote against the bill?

Mr. BLANTON. I certainly do, and I shall try to offer a substitute for it.

The CHAIRMAN. Is the gentleman from Texas opposed to the bill?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is the gentleman from Maryland opposed to the bill?

Mr. HILL of Maryland. I am opposed to the bill, and ask recognition.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that at this time the chairman of the committee is entitled to priority of recognition.

The CHAIRMAN. Certainly.

Mr. CRAMTON. And that the question of who is entitled to recognition in opposition may properly be settled when the time comes for some one to be recognized in opposition to the bill.

Mr. BLANTON. We might just as well settle it now and then we will know how to apportion the time.

Mr. CRAMTON. The gentleman from Texas does not require any great amount of notice to get a speech ready.

Mr. BLANTON. There are some other gentlemen over here that want some time.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Michigan make a point of order on the settlement of this question?

Mr. CRAMTON. At this time; yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, that is clearly a matter within the discretion of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. I think the point of order is not well taken. I wish to say that the matter is entirely within the discretion of the Chair and it has been customary, always, when a member of the committee is not found in opposition to the bill demanding time to give that time to some member of the minority of the House, not to a member of the majority of the House, and since no other gentlemen, except the gentleman from Maryland and the gentleman from Texas, have risen asking for recognition, the Chair feels constrained to recognize the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BLANTON. I reserve the time, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. I understand the gentleman from Texas is saying that he is opposed to the bill, but he is going to offer a substitute which might strengthen the very terms of the original enactment he is in opposition to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair can not see a parliamentary inquiry in that. There is no parliamentary question before the House for decision at this time. The gentleman from Texas stated definitely he was opposed to the bill.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Chairman, as I see it, the gentleman from Texas wants an enactment even stronger than the one proposed by the committee.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I am absolutely against this bill and am going to vote against every feature of it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair can not know what is in the mind of the gentleman from Texas. The gentleman from Texas says he is opposed to the bill and, of course, the Chair on that statement is bound to recognize him as a member of the minority of the House.

Mr. CELLER. Should not the Chair go beyond the mere letter of what the gentleman from Texas states and go into the spirit of what he intends to propose? I am on the minority side and I oppose this bill in toto.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair can not understand what the gentleman is intending to propose. The Chair is not a mind reader.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask for the regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts is recognized for one hour.

Mr. WINSLOW. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, this bill came before the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce at the request of that department of the Government which had to do with the enforcement of the Volstead Act. The preliminary story can be made very short, as can a statement in respect of the subject matter of the bill. It appears that the department which is charged with the enforcement of the Volstead Act is of the opinion that it can be helped very materially in its work if put in a position to control the delivery of intoxicants for beverage purposes by way of the high seas. Such a condition prevails, or is reported to prevail, along the coast of the United States, Alaska, Porto Rico, the Philippines, and wherever the law applies.

Through departmental arrangement the Coast Guard has been assigned for some time, as part of its cares and tribulations, the enforcement of liquor enforcement law as pertaining to the high seas. The Coast Guard has not reached out for this new job, but being a United States department, with a long record of fine service, they take whatever is wished on them. It has come to pass that as between the Navy of the United States and the Coast Guard, after a continuation, maybe, of diplomatic negotiations of the "Alphonse and Gaston" order, the Coast Guard finds itself lined up to do this work. It has been made clear by the department which has to enforce the law to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce that it is necessary to have more and different ships for the Coast Guard if it is to do its contemplated work within the requirements thus far set up for the Coast Guard.

The original plan suggested comprehended the construction of new ships particularly adapted to general Coast Guard work but suitable for operations in connection with the enforcement of the Volstead Act. The original idea was probably wise for the reason that the Coast Guard is now short of ships for doing that wonderful work of rescue, salvage, and so on, for which it is so well known; but the administration and one department and another having to do with expenditure matters have concluded that it is not wise at present to invest the amount of money which would be required to build entirely new ships, and, further, they have concluded that the work of enforcement could be more quickly undertaken and increased if we were to use ships already owned by the Government.

Consequently it has been worked out that a number of what are called second-class torpedo-boat destroyers, which are second class only in respect of their size and capacity, be handed over to the Coast Guard, and the plan comprehended, but not set forth in this bill, will also involve the construction of several other types of smaller craft; but with that we now have nothing directly to do.

The committee comes before the House and so on to the committee with the bill which you probably have in your hands and which provides for three general classes of legislation, the first one to provide for the transfer of some 20 torpedo-boat destroyers to the Coast Guard from the Navy and likewise a couple of mine sweepers. It also provides for the establishment of a proper personnel to man such an increased Coast Guard fleet, and then, again, it makes general provisions under several headings to govern the well-being of officers and enlisted men who may be connected with this augmented service of the Coast Guard.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WINSLOW. Yes.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. Has the committee estimated the cost of that to the Government?

Mr. WINSLOW. The cost to the Government for making over the 20 destroyers and the construction of other ships which would augment them—little craft under power—would be about $13,000,000. The cost for maintaining the increased personnel to operate those ships has been estimated in round numbers at the rate of $334,000.

Mr. SCHNEIDER. That is, per year?

Mr. WINSLOW. Yes; $334,000 per year.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WINSLOW. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. This bill provides that the President shall appoint 191 temporary officers in the Coast Guard. How many extra enlisted men would be required to bring the force up to the required number? I refer to the extra personnel which will be required for these extra 191 officers.

Mr. WINSLOW. The inquiry, I think, is a pertinent one and I ought to know, but I can not answer the gentleman offhand. It may be in the hearings, and it may be that some member of our committee will recall that particular point.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman have one of his committee tell us.

Mr. WINSLOW. Yes; if I can.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit, this bill does not involve the appointment of 191 officers. It involves an increase in the commissioned personnel of 149, but it provides for the temporary advancement of 52 from the enlisted personnel to commissions in the Coast Guard Service.

Mr. WINSLOW. That probably is correct.

Mr. BARKLEY. That is only temporary.

Mr. WINSLOW. Yes.

Mr. BARKLEY. The Coast Guard Service was unable to say how many would be required in the enlisted personnel to man these ships because of their character and their inability to predict in advance whether they could get a full complement of men for all these ships, on account of the fact that it is a temporary employment and on account of the character of the service to be required.

Mr. WINSLOW. The gentleman reflects my recollection of it.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I am sure that both the gentlemen from Massachusetts and the gentleman from Kentucky want to be accurate. Here is what the bill provides in section 2:

SEC. 2. (a) The President is authorized to appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, the following temporary officers of the Coast Guard: Two captains, 13 commanders, 25 lieutenant commanders, 48 lieutenants, and 42 lieutenants (junior grade) and ensigns, of the line; and 1 commander, 11 lieutenant commanders, 19 lieutenants, and 40 lieutenants (junior grade) and ensigns, of the Engineer Corps.

If that does not put 191 extra temporary officers into this Coast Guard, then I can not count figures.

Mr. WINSLOW. The gentleman may be right, but, like many other figures, they do not prove the point at issue. The number will have to be provided for, if that is possible, but by advancing men already in the Coast Guard to fill many of them the requirements for actual new talent to go in there are very greatly reduced.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WINSLOW. Yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Are these vessels proposed to be placed at the disposal of the Coast Guard Service now actually in commission by the Navy Department?

Mr. WINSLOW. The only job they have now probably is that of collecting barnacles.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Are they practically obsolete or are they just laid up because of nonuse?

Mr. WINSLOW. I think there is no necessity for them, and they belong, generally speaking, to the "Sons of Rest" in the Navy.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Is it to be a permanent transfer of these naval vessels to the Coast Guard or is it only temporary?

Mr. WINSLOW. The provision says temporary, and the gentleman is as able to tell what that temporary feature may be in respect to enforcement of the law as I am.

Mr. BARKLEY. The testimony of Admiral Billard, who is the head of the Coast Guard, with reference to the point made by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON], if the gentleman from Massachusetts will permit, is as follows:

> If you will add up the number of officers contained in section 2 you will find that it comes to 201. We are asking, however, only for 149 additional officers, because the other 52 represent temporary promotions of officers now in the service, whose places are not to be filled.

Mr. WINSLOW. Quite so.

Mr. BARKLEY. So that the total number of officers over and above the present force would be 149 new men.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. WINSLOW. Certainly.

Mr. BLANTON. One hundred and forty-nine extra officers. The gentleman from Massachusetts knows that when they are appointed there will be 149 promotions of other officers of the line.

Mr. WINSLOW. Perhaps.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. WINSLOW. Yes.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. Has the committee considered what percentage of enforcement will result from this additional expense to the Government?

Mr. WINSLOW. We are all still out of the insane asylum. [Laughter.]

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WINSLOW. Yes.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Will the gentleman furnish the committee information as to the number of men that will be required to man these various ships?

Mr. WINSLOW. The gentleman means enlisted men?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. WINSLOW. They could not tell. They said it would depend largely upon how the work developed and the necessities of the ships. However, they do not expect to require the number of men they would have on board each of these ships for naval purposes.

Mr. SPEAKS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WINSLOW. Yes.

Mr. SPEAKS. Would it not be possible to detail from some other service the officers and men required for this purpose?

Mr. WINSLOW. Such as what?

Mr. SPEAKS. The Navy, for instance.

Mr. WINSLOW. No.

Mr. SPEAKS. Why?

Mr. WINSLOW. The gentleman is a little too many for me. I am going to be perfectly frank about it. The Navy Department and the Coast Guard both agreed that it was not a feasible thing, and the committee did not go back of their statements.

Mr. SPEAKS. I want to suggest that if this were a condition confronting the State of Massachusetts and not the Federal Government and it devolved upon the Governor of Massachusetts to meet the situation, he would immediately detail from the Naval Militia or the National Guard such force as might be necessary to combat the evil.

Why does not the same principle apply here and allow these services to come from the Navy Department? Why should not men enlisted for an emergency purpose, with confessedly a serious situation confronting our Government, be detailed?

Mr. WINSLOW. Well, that is an illustration as to Massachusetts which the gentleman perhaps is better advised on than I am.

Mr. SPEAKS. I mean, why should not they be detailed for this particular purpose?

Mr. WINSLOW. The thought of the two departments was that they have not regarded this as feasible or possible to be advantageously worked out. To dig clear to the bottom of your inquiry would be quite a job, I presume.

Mr. SPEAKS. Does the gentleman really think that is a sufficient explanation of the situation and a reasonable excuse for not carrying out some such program? Say, for instance, it is frequently reported in the press of the country that a fleet of vessels is lying some 10 or 12 miles off the Atlantic coast for the sole and specific purpose of violating the laws of the United States. Now, would it be an unnatural thing to do if those charged with the enforcement of the laws should detail four or five naval vessels of suitable character to go out and see what is going on, at least? It would not be necessary to take any very radical action.

Mr. WINSLOW. I am not going to let the gentleman make a speech in my time, but I will answer any question.

Mr. SPEAKS. To reduce it to a question, does not the gentleman think that some such plan as I am suggesting is entirely feasible and proper?

Mr. WINSLOW. I do not have any information which would warrant me in forming a judgment.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I think the gentleman will recall that the admiral in charge of the Coast Guard, in response to a question from myself on the same line the gentleman is asking about, said that the Attorney General of the United States has ruled that the Navy can not be used for that purpose, that it is a function that belongs to the Treasury Department, and therefore belongs to the Coast Guard, and the Navy could not be used.

Mr. HILL of Maryland. Right on that point as to what the Attorney General has ruled——

Mr. WINSLOW. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. LEA of California. I can give the gentleman some information as to the estimated number of officers and men. The additional officers would be 149, warrant officers 418, enlisted personnel 3,789.

Mr. SCHNEIDER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WINSLOW. I will.

Mr. SCHNEIDER. It is assumed this will be a permanent commission as long as the so-called prohibition exists?

Mr. WINSLOW. Well, I am not an expert on the future; I am not an astrologer. [Laughter.]

Mr. HILL of Maryland. I call the attention of the chairman of the committee to the eighth and following lines on page 15 of the hearings, which are as follows:

> Mr. CROSSER. What is the general scope of the Coast Guard Service?
> Admiral BILLARD. The general duties?
> Mr. CROSSER. Yes.
> Admiral BILLARD. Well, that is a rather long story——

Mr. WINSLOW. Mr. Chairman, I shall have to be protected from the gentleman making a speech in my time. I shall be glad to yield if he asks a question.

Mr. BLANTON. Would the gentleman mind yielding for a question? Does the gentleman know of any provision in our Constitution that prevents the President from using the Navy to enforce such a situation as this?

Mr. WINSLOW. To be truthful, I will admit that I am the only Member in this House who is not a constitutional lawyer. [Laughter and applause.] If the information has been given that is desired, it will be a pleasure to me to yield, and I reserve the remainder of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has used 17 minutes. [Applause.]

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I claim to be as strong a prohibitionist as there is in this House or in the country. I have been a prohibitionist all my life. I live it as well as preach and vote it. I am like my distinguished friend from Ohio, General SHERWOOD, I have yet to take my first drink. I guess some of you may think that I have missed a whole lot. But I have gotten along without it. I have helped to dry numerous counties in Texas, probably as many as has any other one man there, and I am for a nation dry as strict prohibition can make it.

But I am not for this bill and I am not going to vote for it, for it is but a wasteful pretense and sham and will place in the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury, who has never enforced the prohibition laws, additional means to evade the law. This bill adds 175 commissioned officers, 418 warrant officers, and 3,789 enlisted men to our naval personnel, making in all 4,282 additional men to go on our ships more than we have employed at this time. What is the necessity of appointing 175 extra officers and 418 extra warrant officers and 3,789 extra men to go on our ships? We already have in our Navy 7,783 officers and 86,242 enlisted men and we already have in our Marine Corps 1,132 officers and 20,300 enlisted men, all of whom are anxious for something to do. Why can not we use them? Why should we take on 4,282 more men, including 175 more commissioned officers? What is the necessity? Have we not facilities enough already to do exactly what you are attempting to do by this bill? Are we to be estopped by the so-called legal opinion of a politician temporarily at the head of the Department of Justice, who never has been a profound lawyer and never will be one? [Applause.] He is the only one who has said that the President can not use the Navy in suppressing liquor smuggling. What else do we do by this bill that is now before the House?

Mr. CRAMTON. Will the gentleman yield while he is speaking of the use of the Navy in this work?

Mr. BLANTON. I will yield.

Mr. CRAMTON. What would the gentleman think of the effectiveness of this work being under a Navy in charge of Admiral Plunkett, for instance?

Mr. BLANTON. I would put it under the charge of the President, as Commander in Chief, and not Admiral Plunkett; but I would say I would rather have the law enforced under Admiral Plunkett than under Mr. Secretary of the Treasury Mellon, because I have found that an officer of the Army or Navy, I do not care what his personal beliefs are on a question, when you give him a military order to do something he does it, regardless of his own belief. [Applause.] I do not believe in putting the liquor enforcement in the hands of any man who is financially interested in the distilleries of the country. [Applause.] It ought to be placed elsewhere.

There is not one word in the Constitution of the United States that would prohibit the Congress from granting to the President the right to use both the Army and the Navy in suppressing this smuggling of liquor into the United States. There are ample precedents for it. Congress has done just this thing more than once heretofore in the history of our Republic. Let me cite several such acts by the Congress of the United States.

If you will turn to the Statutes at Large of the United States, volume 2, page 426, you will find the act of March 2, 1807, entitled:

An act to prohibit the importation of slaves into any port or place within the jurisdiction of the United States—

And so forth. And from page 428 I quote section 7 of said act, as follows:

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That if any ship or vessel shall be found, from and after the 1st day of January, 1808, in any river, port, bay, or harbor, or on the high seas, within the jurisdictional limits of the United States, or hovering on the coasts thereof, having on board any negro, mulatto, or person of color, for the purpose of selling them as slaves, or with the intent to land the same in any port or place within the jurisdiction of the United States, contrary to the prohibition of this act, every such ship or vessel, together with her tackle, apparel, and furniture, and the goods and effects which shall be found on board the same, shall be forfeited to the use of the United States, and may be seized, prosecuted, and condemned, in any court of the United States having jurisdiction thereof. And it shall be lawful for the President of the United States, and he is hereby authorized, should he deem it expedient, to cause any of the armed vessels of the United States to be manned and employed to cruise on any part of the coast of the United States or Territories thereof, where he may judge attempts will be made to violate the provisions of this act—

And so forth.

So you will see that way back in 1807 the Congress of the United States, having the Constitution fresh in their minds, had the courage to pass a statute turning over to the President the Navy, not merely its boats and armaments, but its officers and men as well, and telling the President to use same in suppressing the smuggling of slaves into the United States. If the Congress had the right in 1807 to pass such a law, why has not the Congress in the year 1924 the same right to pass a similar law? But let me give you another precedent. If you will examine the Statutes at Large of the United States, volume 12, page 255, you will find that on July 13, 1861, the Congress passed an act entitled: "An act to provide for the collection of duties on imports," and so forth, and from page 257 I quote section 7 of said act, as follows:

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That in the execution of the provisions of this act and of the other laws of the United States providing for the collection of duties on imports and tonnage it may and shall be lawful for the President, in addition to the revenue cutters in service, to employ in aid thereof such other suitable vessels as may, in his judgment, be required.

And said act gave authority to the President to use the militia as well as the Navy to enforce the provisions of said act.

Again, let me repeat that whether an admiral believed in prohibition or not, whether he was addicted to drinking or not, he would obey the orders of his superior officer, and the President of the United States is the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, and if he gave orders to an admiral to stop smuggling on a certain coast you could bet your life that such smuggling would be stopped, for that admiral would obey orders.

Mr. ABERNETHY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. In a moment. Here is our distinguished friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUTLER], a man whom we all love and whom everybody loves. I want to say that his distinguished son, a general in the Marine Corps, Gen. Smedley Butler, is no "goody-goody" sort of a fellow. He is a man who would take a drink if he wanted one, though I do not know whether he ever wants one or not. He is not a strict prohibitionist in any sense of the word, so I have been told. He has likely never run with prohibitionists so very much since he left his father's home. [Laughter.] He has been in the service, thrown with all kinds of men.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. BLANTON. But I want to say this: That when the great city of Philadelphia could not enforce the law it asked for that great man from our Marine Corps to be loaned to them, and our Government loaned him to the city of Philadelphia, and he took his general's uniform off, and he has been enforcing the law to the letter in that great city ever since. And I want to say that whenever that banquet is held by the American citizens in his honor, which is to come off before very long, if I am in the State of Texas or anywhere else I am going to traverse the United States to Philadelphia to be present and help do honor to one of the greatest men in this Nation. [Applause.]

Mr. ABERNETHY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. ABERNETHY. Is not the enforcement of the law in a large measure now, so far as the ocean is concerned, in the Coast Guard?

Mr. BLANTON. Partially so; but, unfortunately, the head of all enforcement is in the Treasury Department.

Mr. ABERNETHY. What other agency of the Government could we use?

Mr. BLANTON. I will tell you in just a minute.

Mr. HUDSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. HUDSON. Does not the gentleman know that it is on record of General Butler, that while he is the enforcement officer of Philadelphia he takes no drink? Put that in the RECORD.

Mr. BLANTON. Of course he does not drink while enforcing prohibition, because he is honest. But when he wore a general's uniform in the Marine Corps he was not enforcing prohibition, and he may then have taken a drink whenever he saw fit, though I do not know whether he did or not.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. I know that the gentleman wants to see the law enforced. Has the gentleman any reason to believe that if the Coast Guard is given the appropriation and these men it will not enforce the law?

Mr. BLANTON. I have not gotten that far yet.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. The gentleman knows, in the first place, that they are the Revenue Cutter Service of our country. They guard our shores. That is not the work of the Navy. I believe they are in a better position to enforce the law against rum runners than the Navy itself.

Mr. BLANTON. You know this: That this country is being filled with liquor all the time, and it is still coming in here.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. BARKLEY. What intimate knowledge has the gentleman as to the proclivities of General Butler for drinking, either within or without the service, and what relation has that to this bill?

Mr. BLANTON. I do not know personally that he ever took a drink in his life. I can only speak from information. I know that it is reported that when he became enforcement officer of Philadelphia he said, "I will not take another drink," and he has not taken one since, so I am informed. I infer from that that he formerly took one when he wanted to, though he may not have wanted to.

Mr. BARKLEY. It may be that the remarks of the gentleman might do General Butler a great injustice.

Mr. BLANTON. I thank the gentleman from Kentucky. If I get permission to revise my remarks I will put that in. I will say that there is not a man in the United States who has a higher regard for General Butler than I, whether he ever took a drink or not.

Mr. UPSHAW rose.

Mr. BOYCE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I will yield first to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. UPSHAW]. He is about the best-informed gentleman on that subject that I know of.

Mr. UPSHAW. I was going to ask the gentleman about the proprieties, as suggested by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY]. I was going to ask him to revise his speech in his reference to General Butler. General Butler stated that while originally he was not a prohibitionist, he would not take a drink while he was engaged in enforcing the laws in Philadelphia.

Mr. BLANTON. I can only say to the gentleman that I can delete my own remarks, but I can not those of the gentleman from Georgia——

Mr. UPSHAW. I say this because I would like to crown General Butler as an efficient man, loyal to his oath. But I do not think any officer of the Army or Navy ought to drink the liquor outlawed by the Constitution of his country.

Mr. BOYCE. Now, Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. BOYCE. Is not the gentleman discussing extraneous matters?

Mr. BLANTON. I am only answering questions. I have promised time to others, and I do not wish to consume much time myself.

Mr. BOYCE. I was going to ask if the gentleman's remarks were pertinent to the merits of the bill. But the gentleman is always interesting. Will not the gentleman please confine his remarks to the merits of the bill?

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BLANTON. I will if it is on the bill.

Mr. SCHAFER. Do you not think that the so-called menace caused by rum smuggling will diminish if we allow and permit the manufacture of 2¾ per cent beer?

Mr. BLANTON. I do not answer any questions directed against the Constitution of the United States. [Laughter.] There are numerous lawyers on this floor, some of national repute. I want to ask any one of them to get up here and say whether he knows anything in the Constitution that keeps this Government from using the Navy under just such circumstances as these? If there is a lawyer here, I yield to him now if he claims that there is anything in the Constitution that keeps us from so using the Navy. I pause for reply. I see that there is no one arises to make that claim.

Mr. UPSHAW rose.

Mr. BLANTON. Just a moment. Are you a lawyer?

Mr. UPSHAW. No; I am not a lawyer.

Mr. BLANTON. Well, I yielded to lawyers, not to laymen. I yielded only to lawyers.

Mr. UPSHAW. Just a moment. I am not a lawyer, but I am a constitutional patriot enough to know that the President has the right to employ the Navy if necessary to protect the Constitution of the country.

Mr. BLANTON. Why does he not do it, then, Harry Daugherty to the contrary notwithstanding? [Applause.]

Mr. UPSHAW. I agree with the gentleman.

Mr. BLANTON. I want to say that there is a way to enforce the prohibition laws without these additional 175 new commissioned officers, these 418 new warrant officers, and these 3,789 extra men. There is a way in which you can use the men, concerning whom there was something said about barnacles from inactivity by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WINSLOW] a while ago.

Mr. WINSLOW. Will the gentleman allow me to correct him?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes; certainly.

Mr. WINSLOW. I referred to ships, not to the men.

Mr. BLANTON. I thought when the gentleman referred to the ships he was referring also to what the ships carried.

Here is a resolution which I introduced on January 3, a joint resolution, which has the same force and effect of a bill.

House joint resolution.

Whereas in purposed disregard and violation of the fundamental laws of the Nation organized bands of rich and influential conspirators of national and international prominence are engaged in the nefarious business of unlawfully smuggling intoxicating liquors, narcotics, and aliens into the United States; and

Whereas hundreds of thousands of American laborers are now unable to obtain employment and are without means and opportunity of earning a livelihood for their families, and said smuggled aliens are constantly robbing them of jobs as same become available, thus taking from the mouths of American wives and little children the necessities of life; and many of such smuggled aliens are lawless thugs and anarchists who hate all forms of civilized government, and whose policy and purpose here is to tear down and destroy rather than to build up, and whose presence, acts, and whereabouts our Government has no means of checking or keeping any record thereof; and

Whereas by reason of the fact that on our north the boundary between the United States and Canada is 3,979.7 statute miles, and (counting tidal shore line, unit measure 1 statute mile) on our east the Atlantic coast is 11,679 miles, and on our south the Gulf coast is 6,418 miles, and the boundary between the United States and Mexico is 1,993 miles (sinuosities of river counted), and on our west the Pacific coast is 3,765 miles, it is impossible with civil officers alone to properly police and guard such borders, and it is impossible for civic authorities alone to stop such law violations, which are becoming so prevalently stupendous as to bring our fundamental laws into national and international disrepute, and to seriously menace our institutions; and

Whereas in certain States and in certain large cities like New York, Philadelphia, and Baltimore the local authorities are in open rebellion and insubordination against the eighteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States and the laws passed by Congress in enforcement thereof, and such authorities not only fail and refuse to enforce such laws and to cooperate with the Government in enforcing same but also they, by their public actions, invite citizens to ignore, belittle, and violate same at will and in open defiance of the Constitution and laws of the United States Government, permit scores of unlawful saloons to be run daily in such cities, unlawfully selling intoxicating liquors to thousands of citizens, and civil officers of the United States take their lives in their hands whenever they attempt to arrest any of said offenders, numerous civil officers of the Government having been ruthlessly murdered while performing such duties, and in many instances local officers of cities have resisted Government officers in making arrests; and

Whereas section 8 of Article I of the Constitution of the United States directs Congress to make rules for the government and regulation of the land and naval forces, and to provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union; and

Whereas section 2 of Article II of said Constitution constitutes the President of the United States the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy and of the militia of the several States when called into actual service of the United States; and

Whereas section 3 of Article II of said Constitution provides that the President shall have the laws of the United States faithfully executed; and

Whereas the "bootleggers" of the world know that practically all of our revenue cutters are old, slow, and obsolete, few capable of making 12 knots per hour, and such bootleggers are operating boats of greater speed, while our Navy owns destroyers capable of making 25 knots per hour and owns numerous submarine chasers, many being surplus, and many of which can make 18 knots per hour, and which cost the Government over ten times the price at which our Navy has been offering them for sale, and many being suitable for use in suppressing smuggling; and

Whereas we now have in our Army 11,574 officers and 116,663 enlisted men, and we now have in our Navy 7,783 officers and 86,242 enlisted men, and we now have in our Marine Corps 1,132 officers and 20,300 enlisted men, upon whose hands the monotonous routine of peace time always hangs heavily, and which aggregate force, maintained and paid through burdensome taxation of the people, could promptly suppress all unlawful smuggling into the United States, and all rebellious defiance of our Government and its Constitution and laws of the United States, without impairing the morale of such forces or the security of our country; and

Whereas using the Army and Navy in suppressing smuggling and rebellious defiance of our Government and laws would save the people the expense of furnishing them other amusement, such as sending a great fleet on a trip to Panama, the press reporting to-day that "Admiral Coontz had just weighed anchor for Panama, where he will command 15 battleships, 4 light cruisers, 63 destroyers, 11 submarines, and 87 airplanes"; and

Whereas the mere passage of this resolution authorizing the President to use the Army and Navy will immediately strike terror into the hearts of all offenders and cause such crimes to stop; Therefore be it

Resolved, etc., That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to use and employ the entire naval and military forces of the United States, including the militia, the entire facilities of the United States Shipping Board and the United States Shipping Board Emergency Fleet Corporation, the entire facilities of the inland and coastwise waterways service, and the resources of the Government, or so much of any of the above as he may deem necessary, in suppressing all such unlawful smuggling into the United States, and in suppressing all such rebellious defiance of our Government and its Constitution and laws, and to enable the President to bring such insubordinate law violations to a successful termination, and to faithfully execute the laws of our Republic as required of him by the Constitution, all of the resources of the country are hereby pledged by the Congress of the United States.

I want to ask my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. WINSLOW], I want to ask this Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and I want to ask every Member present why should not there be such a resolution as that passed if you honestly want to stop the smuggling of intoxicating liquor into the United States?

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield.

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. Does not the gentleman's resolution, in specially authorizing the President to use the Army and the Navy of the Nation to enforce these laws, assume that the President does not now have that authority?

Mr. BLANTON. Attorney General Daugherty has held that he has not, and, because of such holding, I am seeking to have the Congress give him the authority, so there will no longer be any question about it. The President is not enforcing these laws now. I know that President Harding, our deceased President, decided that he would enforce them; I know that shortly before his death he intended to enforce them, and I believe that if he had lived he would have made a special effort to have these laws enforced by this time.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. I know the gentleman wants to be fair. He knows the President of the United States has asked Congress to pass this bill in order to help him enforce these laws?

Mr. BLANTON. That is what I am talking about now. Why did not he ask for the Navy? We have it already. It would not cost anything extra. Its 94,025 officers and men are idle. I think this bill is a foolish bill. With these additions, the combined Coast Guard can not watch even a small part of one coast. The gentleman from Ohio knows how highly I regard him and his ideas on this question. I stand right with him, shoulder to shoulder, on this prohibition question, but this bill will not stop smuggling, and we all know it.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. I do not know whether the gentleman intended to leave the impression or not, but he made the statement that the President of the United States was not enforcing these laws.

Mr. BLANTON. Well, is he? Will anyone here say he is?

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. He asks for this bill so that he can enforce them.

Mr. BLANTON. Well, is he enforcing the prohibition laws?

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. If the gentleman wants him to enforce these laws he will support this bill.

Mr. BLANTON. Is he now enforcing them?

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. He is doing the best he can with the material he has.

Mr. BLANTON. That is the trouble. He has not the material, and this bill does not give him the proper material. I want to ask the distinguished gentleman from Ohio and this committee, with all the coast we have, the Atlantic coast and the Pacific coast, the hundreds of miles along the Mexican border and the hundreds of miles along the Canadian border, whether they believe that with these 175 extra commissioned officers manning as many ships as they can man they can adequately guard that coast?

Mr. STEPHENS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I will yield, but first I want to let my colleagues answer that if they can. Do any of you think that?

Mr. WINSLOW. If the gentleman is asking that directly of me I will answer that I do not think they can.

Mr. BLANTON. Then why does the gentleman propose this futile bill?

Mr. WINSLOW. I make that statement for this reason: That the Government of the United States, the President, and all the others, are no more competent to get 100 per cent perfection in results desired than is the gentleman himself as a legislator. [Applause.]

Mr. BLANTON. But the President can get results with the Navy, and I want to give him the Navy and let him get results. I want to say this: I know a distinguished young man in Washington who has been to Annapolis; he was marching down the street here not long ago and a well-dressed, fine-looking man, about 35 or 40 years old, stopped him and said, "I see you are wearing your Annapolis insignia," a ring or watch, or whatever it was. The young man said, "Yes." The man said, "Are you a navigator?" The young man said, "Yes; I have had training at Annapolis." This man said, "Well, I will tell you; you are the very man I need." He said, "I want to make a proposition to you." He took him off and this was the proposition he made. He said, "I have been employed in the Revenue Cutter Service; I have been stationed on the coast of Florida and have been working at it for several years." He said, "We condemned a liquor smuggling boat that we caught down there some time ago and it was such a fine one that I saw a chance to make some money, and I bought it in, with some little help that I was able to get." He said, "I have resigned my position, and it is just 90 miles from our coast down there over to where we can get all the liquor we want." He said, "We can make $12 net profit a case easily."

Mr. KINDRED. More than that.

Mr. BLANTON. He said, "We can make $12 a case net profit and not risk a dollar under the agreement I have made and we do not run any risk, and we can bring numerous boatloads across each week." He said, "I know of a little inlet down there which I do not believe is known to anybody else, where we can come in and land, but," he said, "I need a navigator, and if you will come in with me I will guarantee you $1,000 a month." That was his proposition to this young ensign of this Government. But the young fellow happened to be honest and he said, "You are talking to the wrong man."

Mr. STEPHENS. Will the gentleman yield now?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. STEPHENS. If we furnish the Navy and all of the Army and put them into this service, does the gentleman think they could enforce these laws?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes; they could. And they would stop smuggling. I will tell the gentleman what I believe. If you would pass such a resolution as the one I read you to-day, giving the President of the United States not the Army but just the Navy to enforce this law, I do not believe you would have very many attempts at smuggling after it became generally learned by smugglers. I honestly believe that. Do not ever believe that the foreign smugglers, like that English lord who urged men to subscribe to his project and said, "I will guarantee you so much profit and return on your money every month."

Mr. STEPHENS. How about the Canadian border?

Mr. BLANTON. The same way it could be protected by the Army.

Mr. STEPHENS. You would have to have the Army, too, would you not?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes, as to land borders; but so far as our water fronts are concerned you would strike terror into every smuggler of the world if they knew our Navy was after them.

Mr. SCHAFER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield.

Mr. SCHAFER. You have just related a little story which impressed me as being a conspiracy to defeat law enforcement. Being a strong advocate of law enforcement, have you reported the little incidents as you related them to us a few moments ago to the proper officers, so they can watch these men who want to willfully violate the eighteenth amendment?

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman would have me wasting my time reporting one case when there are thousands of such cases of law violations over the United States. I am not engaged as a revenue-enforcement officer or as a liquor-enforcement officer. I am a legislator here, busy all the time in the House. I am looking at the question from a broad, fundamental, national standpoint and not looking at one little violator. I am looking at the question with the purpose and the intent to stop it nationally.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota and Mr. KINDRED rose.

Mr. BLANTON. I am sorry I can not yield to further questions. I promised to yield some time to others, and I am not going to take up any more time. I reserve the balance of my time, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. WINSLOW. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. HILL].

Mr. HILL of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Texas also said he would yield me 10 minutes.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman. I have promised so much time and so much of my time was taken up with questions——

Mr. HILL of Maryland. Can not the gentleman yield me the 10 minutes the gentleman said he would yield me?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield the gentleman five minutes.

Mr. HILL of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman if he can not yield me the 10 minutes he agreed to yield.

Mr. WINSLOW. Mr. Chairman, when I yielded time to the gentleman it was on the assurance that the opposite side would not yield any time at all.

Mr. HILL of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, I yield back the time the gentleman from Massachusetts yielded me. I told him the gentleman from Texas had promised me 10 minutes, but I doubted if I would get it, in view of the many questions being asked the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, may I say that I took up much more time because of questions than I intended, and that is the reason I can not yield the gentleman 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland has the floor.

Mr. HILL of Maryland. I have five minutes, have I not?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized for 10 minutes.

[Mr. HILL of Maryland was given permission to revise and extend his remarks.]

Mr. HILL of Maryland. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, on March 6 the Senate passed the Treasury appropriation bill, which we had previously passed, and on page 25 there is this item:

Total, Coast Guard, exclusive of commandant's office, $10,516,944.

On February 12 there was reported into this House, and there will soon be taken up for consideration, the first deficiency appropriation bill. At page 36 of the first deficiency appropriation bill appears the following item:

In all, Coast Guard, $13,887,007.07.

Gentlemen of the committee, this makes an appropriation of $24,403,951.07 for the Coast Guard for the ensuing year. This is $2,157,384.01 more than your total appropriation for the Navy in 1890. Your appropriation for the Navy in 1890 was $22,246,567.06. Your appropriation for 1910 was $137,779,550.31.

Now, gentlemen, you are asked to spend an additional $13,000,000 of the people's money. I am against this bill, and I must confess I am against this bill with a great deal of hesitation, because I dislike very much to be against anything that is specifically advocated by the President of the United States, and the President of the United States does advocate this. I invite your attention to page 19 of the hearings before the committee containing the letter of the President to the Speaker of the House, in which he calls attention to the alleged necessity for this expenditure of nearly $14,000,000, and in which he sums up the need of equipping 20 torpedo-boat destroyers at $100,000 each and the other items. The President's letter, with part of the letter from the Director of the Budget, is as follows:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, February 1, 1924.

THE SPEAKER OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith for the consideration of Congress supplemental estimates of appropriations for the Treasury Department for the fiscal year 1924, for increasing the equipment and personnel of the United States Coast Guard, amounting to $13,853,989.

The purposes of the appropriations requested, the necessity therefor, and the reasons for the submission of the estimates at this time are set forth in the letter of the Director of the Bureau of the Budget transmitted herewith, with whose comments and observations thereon I concur.

Respectfully, CALVIN COOLIDGE.

BUREAU OF THE BUDGET,
Washington, February 1, 1924.

SIR: I have the honor to submit herewith for your consideration, and upon your approval for transmission to Congress, supplemental estimates of appropriations for the Treasury Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1924, for increasing the equipment and personnel of the United States Coast Guard, amounting to $13,853,989.

In your annual message to the Congress, referring to your duty to enforce the laws preventing violation of the prohibition amendment to the Constitution, you presented the need of greatly strengthening the United States Coast Guard to prevent smuggling, and expressed your opinion that a supply of swift power boats should be provided for this purpose.

Here is the most important portion of the letter of the Director of the Budget:

Briefly summarized, the estimates provide for the procurement by transfer from the Navy Department of the 20 torpedo-boat destroyers of the second line and the 2 mine sweepers or other similar type of vessel above referred to; also for the building or purchase of 223 "cabin cruiser" type motor boats, with necessary equipment, including radio installation; the building or purchase of 100 "Seabright dory" type motor boats, with necessary equipment; the reopening of 19 life-saving stations now on the inactive list; the organization of 24 section bases for supervising the activities of the vessels and boats engaged in the prevention of liquor smuggling; the establishment of 3 receiving stations for the equipment and training of recruits; and the necessary provisions for pay and allowances of the temporary commissioned and enlisted personnel; for rations, supplies, equipment, travel, contingent expenses, and other incidental items; and finally for an increase in the civilian personnel at Coast Guard headquarters to handle the greatly increased administrative work which will undoubtedly result from the increased activities.

The details of the estimates submitted herewith are as follows:

Coast Guard, 1924 (additional vessels and boats):
Conditioning and equipping 20 torpedo-boat destroyers, at $100,000 each	$2,000,000
Conditioning and equipping 2 mine sweepers or other suitable type of vessel, at $55,000 each	110,000
Construction of 223 "cabin cruiser" type motor boats, at $37,500 each	8,362,500
Equipment for same, including radio outfits	909,900
Construction of 100 "Seabright dory" type motor boats, at $37,500 each	8,362,500
Equipment for same, at $125 each	12,500
Total	12,194,900
Coast Guard, 1924:
Pay and allowances of commissioned, warrant, and enlisted personnel, etc	945,179
Rations or commutation thereof for petty officers and other enlisted men	807,001
Fuel and water for vessels, stations, and houses of refuge	170,783
Outfits, ship chandlery, and engineers' stores	265,351
Rebuilding and repairing stations, etc	24,775
Gratuities to dependent relatives of deceased officers and enlisted men (act of June 4, 1920)	2,500
Mileage, travel expenses, etc	100,000
Contingent expenses, etc	56,333
Total	1,645,622

The expenditure called for is $13,853,989 in addition to the $10,516,944 you have already appropriated for the Coast Guard for the ensuing year.

I hesitate, as I say, to oppose such an appropriation, but I do not think you can let your enthusiasm for law enforcement—and "law enforcement" in this bill means prohibition enforcement, attempted enforcement of the Volstead Act and the eighteenth amendment, and does not mean general law enforcement—you can not allow your hysteria for prohibition enforcement to blind you to the essential facts of the case.

What is the status of the Coast Guard?

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for just a short question?

Mr. HILL of Maryland. I am sorry I can not yield at this time. I will yield later.

I invite your attention to page 15 of the hearings, on which are the matters on which I attempted to question the chairman of the committee. There are only a few lines, and I will read them:

Mr. CROSSER. What is the general scope of the Coast Guard Service?

Admiral BILLARD. The general duties?

Mr. CROSSER. Yes.

Admiral BILLARD. Well, that is a rather long story, because one of the characteristics of the Coast Guard is the great multiplicity of its duties. We become part of the Navy in time of war, or whenever the President shall so direct.

I also want to invite your attention to page 5 of the hearings, a portion of which I will now read, in which Admiral Billard says this kind of work for enforcing prohibition is new to the Coast Guard and not their regular business:

Mr. SANDERS. In selecting these officers it would be a little more difficult than to get officers for regular Coast Guard work, will it not? That is, this sort of work for the Coast Guard is not as desirable as ordinary Coast Guard work. How do you find that?

Admiral BILLARD. Of course, it is a different kind of work. You see, our regular Coast Guard officers are trained three years in the academy and are carefully picked. We know that we have got to carry them, if they behave themselves, for the rest of their lives. We are extremely careful about it. These officers are all temporary officers, corresponding to the temporary officers that the Navy took in during the war.

In view of these statements, I can not believe that the proposed legislation will be effective if passed. Furthermore, the Coast Guard now can be put under the Navy for any purpose Congress desires, at the direction of the President.

I have in my hands the opinion of the Attorney General of the United States. The Attorney General says that under existing law the President can not order the Navy to enforce the national prohibition act, but he does cite on page 506 of his opinion numerous cases in which the President of the United States has used the Navy when he deemed an emergency existed.

The Attorney General says that there is no present emergency which justifies the President to use the naval power, but the Attorney General shows clearly that you can—Congress can—place the Navy at the disposal of the President for this temporary purpose. The opinion of the Attorney General has been often misquoted and I ask you to read it. It is as follows:

USE OF NAVAL FORCES IN THE ENFORCEMENT OF THE NATIONAL PROHIBITION ACT.

The President has no authority to use the naval forces in the enforcement of the national prohibition act when no emergency exists.

There can be no emergency authorizing the President to call out the naval forces to enforce civil and criminal laws until the courts and civil departments of the Government are no longer able to enforce them.

There are no unlawful obstructions, combinations, or assemblages of persons or rebellion against the authority of the Government of the United States in the enforcement of the national prohibition act and of the revenue laws of the United States such as to render it impracticable to continue to enforce these laws by the ordinary course of executive and judicial proceedings.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
September 13, 1923.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge receipt of your letter requesting my opinion as to whether it lies within your power to use the naval forces of the United States in the enforcement of the national prohibition act, in the absence of a national emergency, and whether, if such question is answered in the negative, an emergency now exists such as to authorize you to call upon the Navy to help enforce the civil and criminal laws of the United States.

The constitutional powers of the President are expressed in Article II, section 2, of the Constitution of the United States, as follows:

"(1) The executive power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America. * * *

"SEC. 2. (1) The President shall be Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States, and of the Militia of the several States, when called into actual service of the United States; * * *

"SEC. 3. * * * He shall take care that the laws be faithfully executed; * * *."

The constitutional powers of Congress are expressed in Article I, section 8, of the Constitution of the United States, as follows:

"SEC. 8. (1) The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts and excises, to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States; * * *

"(11) To declare war, grant letters of marque and reprisal, and make rules concerning captures on land and water;

"(12) To raise and support armies, * * *

"(13) To provide and maintain a Navy; * * *

"(14) To make rules for the government and regulation of the land and naval forces; * * *

"(15) To provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections and repel invasions; * * *

"(18) To make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof.

"SEC. 9. (7) No money shall be drawn from the Treasury but in consequence of appropriations made by law; * * *"

In pursuance of its constitutional powers the Congress at an early date in the history of our Government established a Navy as one of the war arms of the Government and a Department of the Navy to administer the naval power authorized by the Constitution.

Revised Statutes, sections 415 and 417, taken from the act of Congress of April 30, 1798 (1 Stat. 553), provides:

"SEC. 415. There shall be at the seat of government an executive department, to be known as the Department of the Navy, and a Secretary of the Navy, who shall be the head thereof; * * *

"SEC. 417. The Secretary of the Navy shall execute such orders as he shall receive from the President relative to the procurement of naval stores and materials, and the construction, armament, equipment, and employment of vessels of war, as well as all other matters connected with the Naval Establishment."

Under Article I, section 9, of the Constitution, supra, by act of Congress the heads of departments of the Government are required annually to communicate estimates of expenditures and appropriations needed for the various branches of the Government for the following fiscal year to the Secretary of the Treasury and to the President, who shall transmit the same to Congress with information on the state of the Union, making such recommendations as he may deem appropriate.

Section 3678 of the Revised Statutes, relating to appropriations by Congress, provides:

"All sums appropriated for the various branches of expenditure in the public service shall be applied solely to the objects for which they are respectively made, and for no others."

In accord with the statutes providing for the estimates of the expenses of the Department of the Navy and the maintenance of the Navy the Congress on January 22, 1923, passed an act appropriating for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1924 (42 Stat. 1134):

"For all emergencies and extraordinary expenses, exclusive of personal services in the Navy Department or any of its subordinate bureaus or offices at Washington, D. C., arising at home or abroad, but impossible to be anticipated or classified, to be expended on the approval and authority of the Secretary of the Navy, and for such purposes as he may deem proper, $40,000."

Naval vessels are men of war and in time of war are used for war purposes. In time of peace section 1534 of the Revised Statutes provides—

"The President is authorized to keep in actual service in time of peace such of the public armed vessels as, in his opinion, may be required by the nature of the service, and to cause the residue thereof to be laid up in ordinary in convenient ports."

In the light of the above review of the constitutional provisions and statutory regulations necessary for consideration of the subject, your two questions will be considered in their order following:

(1) May the President of the United States use the naval forces to enforce the national prohibition act when there is no emergency?

(2) Are there conditions of violations of the national prohibition act authorizing him to lawfully declare an emergency of law enforcement to exist and to call forth the naval forces to enforce the national prohibition act and revenue laws of the United States in our territorial waters?

The Congress has passed no special statute authorizing the President to use naval vessels to enforce the national prohibition act within our territorial waters, nor to execute the civil or criminal laws of the United States, except in cases of emergency, as provided for in sections 5298 and 5318 of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

There seems to have been but one instance in the history of our country in times of profound peace when Congress did authorize the use of naval vessels to enforce the civil or criminal statutes of the United States directed against individuals and when and where no emergency existed.

Article I, section 9, of the Constitution permitted the importation of slaves into the United States up to January 1, 1808.

March 2, 1807, the Congress passed an act to prohibit the importation of slaves into any port or place within the jurisdiction of the United States from the 1st day of January, 1808, and provided that it should be lawful for the President of the United States to use the naval forces for the purposes of enforcing said act against the slave trade (2 Stat. 426, 428). Under authority of said statute the President of the United States used naval vessels to enforce the act of Congress against the slave trade.

July 13, 1861, the Congress passed an emergent act (12 Stat. 255, 257) providing that where the collection of duties on imports at ports of the United States where insurrection existed were resisted by force or by combination or assemblages of persons too great to be overcome by officers of customs it should be lawful for the President to employ such part of the Army, Navy, or militia of the United States as might be deemed necessary for the purpose of enforcing the customs laws.

It would therefore seem that Congress did not consider that the President of the United States possessed the power to use the naval forces in time of peace for the execution of civil or criminal laws without its expressed authorization.

There are some statutes authorizing the President to use the naval forces under certain circumstances, such as to execute processes of courts when officers of the United States are unlawfully obstructed from doing so; to protect the timber of the United States; to execute the quarantine laws; to protect extradited prisoners; to observe the neutrality of our country; to expel foreign offensive vessels; to suppress insurrections and rebellions, and robbery on the high seas; to aid distressed navigators, salvage vessels, and remove derelicts; and to prevent the slave and coolie trade. However, none of these special statutes confer authority for the use of the naval vessels to enforce ordinary civil and criminal statutes such as the national prohibition act and the revenue laws.

Instances have been cited where naval vessels have been sent by the President to protect national rights and citizens in foreign countries and to perform missions of mercy for people in distress, but the power to put the Navy to such uses is found in special appropriation bills, such as the act of January 22, 1923, supra, providing for unforeseen contingencies. Enforcing the civil and criminal laws of the United States can hardly be classed as unforeseen contingencies.

It has been suggested that the President by virtue of his combined constitutional powers, as Commander in Chief of the Army, Navy, and militia, when in the service of the United States, and the duty that rests upon him to see that the laws are enforced, may use the Navy to enforce the eighteenth amendment and the national prohibition act within our territorial waters.

The Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Johnson v. Sayre (158 U. S. 109, 114) quoted the clauses of the Constitution empowering Congress to provide and maintain a Navy and to make rules for the government and regulation of the land and naval forces of the United States, and, commenting thereon, said:

> "Congress is thus expressly vested with the power to make rules for the government of the whole Regular Army and Navy at all times; and to provide for governing such part only of the militia of the several States as, having been called forth to execute the laws of the Union, to suppress insurrections, or to repel invasions, is employed in the service of the United States."

While the particular clause of the Constitution in issue in that case was that authorizing the Congress "to make rules for the government of the land and naval forces," the Supreme Court declared that Congress is thus expressly vested with the power to make rules for the government of the whole Regular Army and Navy at all times. The clause of the Constitution authorizing Congress "to provide and maintain a Navy" confers on it the power of determining when and for what purpose the naval forces of the United States may be used. It follows that the constitutional provision constituting the President the Commander in Chief of the Army, Navy, and militia would not give power to use the Navy in a manner other than as authorized by Congress.

The appropriations made by Congress for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1924, are specially allotted for specific objects with the exception of the appropriation of $40,000, which is to cover emergencies and extraordinary expenses arising at home or abroad impossible to be anticipated or classified. Surely expenses incident to the enforcement of prohibition and internal revenue laws could not come under such designation.

Congress having thus expressly limited the uses of public funds, the Executive may not disregard such limitations when interposed within constitutional powers. I am of the opinion, therefore, that you have no authority to use the naval forces in the enforcement of the national prohibition act when no emergency exists.

The second question presented is—

Are there such violations of the national prohibition act and of the revenue laws within the territorial waters of the United States as authorize the President to declare an emergency to exist and call out the naval forces to execute the civil and criminal laws?

Section 5298 of the Revised Statutes provides—

> "Whenever, by reason of unlawful obstructions, combinations, or assemblages of persons, or rebellion against the authority of the Government of the United States, it shall become impracticable, in the judgment of the President, to enforce, by the ordinary course of judicial proceedings the laws of the United States within any State or Territory, it shall be lawful for the President to call forth the militia of any or all the States, and to employ such parts of the land and naval forces of the United States as he may deem necessary to enforce the faithful execution of the laws of the United States, or to suppress such rebellion, in whatever State or Territory thereof the laws of the United States may be forcibly opposed, or the execution thereof forcibly obstructed."

And section 5318 of the Revised Statutes provides—

> "In the execution of laws providing for the collection of duties on imports and tonnage, the President, in addition to the revenue cutters in service, may employ in aid thereof such other suitable vessels as may, in his judgment, be required."

Both these statutes were Civil War acts and were passed to empower the President to use the naval forces in the States in insurrection to collect the import duties where their collection was unlawfully resisted and where the execution of the laws of the United States was unlawfully obstructed and could not be enforced in the ordinary course of executive or judicial proceedings.

An emergency authorizing the President to call the military and naval forces to execute the laws exists only when by reason of unlawful obstruction, combinations, or assemblages of persons, or rebellion against the authorities of the United States, it becomes impracticable in the judgment of the President to enforce the laws by the ordinary course of executive or judicial proceedings.

There can be no emergency authorizing the President to call out the naval forces to enforce civil and criminal laws until the courts and the civil departments of the Government are no longer able to enforce them.

While there have been numerous violations of the national prohibition act, both on land and within our territorial waters, there have been no unlawful obstructions of the functions of the courts or restraint of their processes, or of the Coast Guard, the Division of Customs, the prohibition unit, nor of the marshals and their deputies of the Department of Justice. All the departments of the Government are functioning and making a steady advance against lawless elements.

In general the prohibition act is being enforced. There are stubborn exceptions in congested localities in some of which local support has not been rendered. There are places where public opinion is unfriendly and the enforcement of this law is difficult. But I can not believe that such isolated cases constitute a national emergency within the meaning of the act of Congress above quoted.

I am, therefore, of the opinion that there are no unlawful obstructions, combinations, or assemblages of persons, or rebellion against the authority of the Government of the United States in the enforcement of the prohibition statutes, such as render it impracticable to continue to enforce these laws by the ordinary course of executive and judicial proceedings.

Respectfully, HARRY M. DAUGHERTY.

To the PRESIDENT.

You will see from this opinion that no emergency exists, but that Congress can put the Navy at the disposition of the President at will, and thus save $13,887,007.07.

The Committee on Appropriations has held lengthy hearings and, according to the statement of the heads of the Coast Guard, Admiral Billard and Commander Root, there is a war going on which is a rebellion or an invasion of the United States, although apparently the Attorney General dissents. If you will read the testimony of the Coast Guard people who want these extra ships and men, and also extra motion, you will think the United States is menaced; but I hold in my hand what the gentlemen on the prohibition side of this House ought to regard as sacred literature, and I am going to read to you the statement of Federal Prohibition Commissioner Roy B. Haynes that all this talk about smuggling being the great source of prohibition violation is bunk; and if you believe Roy B. Haynes, all the gentlemen who favor this pending bill are propagandists for the bootlegger. I invite your attention to this book, Prohibition Inside and Out, published in the newspapers serially as "Marked for death by rum runners," as an official story but copyrighted and, I understand, a source of over $200,000,000 of profit to, of, and by Roy B. Haynes.

> It is virtually impossible to buy good whisky from the illicit-liquor interests in the United States to-day.
> What the bootlegger offers as high-grade imported whisky or bottled-in-bond stuff is neither. In 95 per cent of the cases or more it is moonshine—not pure and simple, but watered, thinned down, adulterated, and fearfully doctored with chemicals, many poisonous, to give it color, a "kick," and a bead.
> The moonshine still is the bootlegger's chief source of supply. From what other place can he get his liquor in quantity? Surely not from the rigidly controlled bonded warehouses; they are eliminated at once. As to smuggling liquor, some, it is true, is brought into the country, but not one-tenth as much as the illegal traffic would have us believe.
> When reports of huge smuggling operations are circulated it should be remembered that the illicit-liquor interests are conducting a great and elaborate propaganda campaign to discredit law enforcement, and that the spreading of such reports is part and parcel of that campaign. No bootlegger, of course, is willing to admit that he can obtain only adulterated moonshine. Hence fanciful tales of the wet wave sweeping in on our coasts and other related falsehoods swung from mouth to mouth to hide the real and dangerous origin of what the bootlegger has to sell.

I protested against Haynes's use of the word "official" on the newspaper publication of this story, because if it was "official" it should not be copyrighted and sold to a few papers, but be given to all. The Treasury required Haynes to drop the word "official," but if Haynes is fit to be prohibition commissioner we must credit these statements.

I again invite the attention of the committee to pages 69, 70, and 71 of the so-called official statement of Federal Prohibition Commissioner Haynes, which, as I understand it, is sold at $2.50 per volume. Under the head of "Running the Rum Blockade," Mr. Haynes says:

> It was a new thing when the "rum fleet" was first heralded as rocking at anchor outside of the 3-mile limit off the Jersey coast. There was an impudent daring about the proceeding that sent the story booming over the wires to newspaper front pages everywhere. The "wets" chortled with glee. They foresaw a difficult task for the Government in finding means to plug this leak that seemed so big.

What they did not realize, or would not, was that even stretched to the utmost limit of possibility this was no more than a mere leak. In the actual amount of illicitly transported liquor it brought to our shores, it was as the dregs in the glass when compared with what we normally consumed prior to the enactment of the eighteenth amendment.

Note what Haynes says: "Smuggling is no more than a mere leak." Will you spend $13,887,007.07, and then some, to try and stop what Haynes calls "a mere leak"?

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman state whether his opposition to the bill is based upon the statement he has just read?

Mr. HILL of Maryland. I state that my opposition to the bill is based on this statement in part, and I will say to the gentleman——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Maryland has expired.

Mr. HILL of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, I ask one more minute from the gentleman from Texas, if he will kindly grant it.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, while I do not agree with the gentleman, I am constrained to yield him one minute more.

Mr. HILL of Maryland. I want to quote just these few lines more of Federal Prohibition Commissioner Haynes's testimony:

When all is said and done, what is the truth about smuggled liquor? It is not difficult to find the answer. The greatest possible measure of the traffic is written in the official records of Great Britain, France, Cuba, and other nations which are the only source of supply for the smuggling traffic.

Assume, if you will, that all of the liquor exported by all of those countries into all the ports from which smuggling is physically possible actually was smuggled into the United States.

If that impossible situation really existed, the United States would get from smugglers less than 1 per cent of the amount of liquor she drank prior to prohibition. Specifically the figure would be approximately two-thirds of 1 per cent.

In effect the official export records of foreign countries show that prohibition enforcement in the United States, so far as genuine foreign-made liquor is concerned, is as rigid as the Volstead Act itself. It has cut consumption to one-half of 1 per cent by volume or less.

Do you believe Admiral Billard, and will you spend $13,000,000 more to be thrown into the maw of prohibition, or do you believe Roy A. Haynes, as he appears in this book, published, copyrighted, and for sale by Doubleday, Page & Co., at Garden City, since November, 1923?

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL of Maryland. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Does the gentleman believe what is in that book?

Mr. HILL of Maryland. That is a delicate question. The gentleman knows that I have asked that Mr. Haynes be investigated and removed, because I do not believe he is enforcing the law or capable of enforcing it.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. The gentleman is quoting it, and yet he does not believe it himself.

Mr. HILL of Maryland. Who can we believe? Billard or Haynes?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Maryland has expired.

Mr. WINSLOW. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY].

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman, we have often heard of the old adage that the devil can quote scripture for his own purpose. It seems also that he can quote Roy A. Haines. [Laughter.] I do not wish to be discourteous, but I shall ask not to be interrupted until I have finished some general remarks which I hope may clear up some of the rubbish that has accumulated on this bill.

In the adoption of the eighteenth amendment to our Constitution the people of the United States have said that they do not desire intoxicating liquors imported into the United States. Under that amendment Congress has attempted to pass laws necessary not only to prevent the manufacture and transportation and sale of intoxicating liquors in the United States, but to prevent their importation into the United States. It would be a very interesting thing if I had the time to outline the development of this illegal rum business from the outside into the United States along its shores. It is one of the best organized businesses that now exists in the world, and its lines of communication are almost coextensive with the telegram and radio and other means of communication. It is operated largely from the city of New York. It has headquarters in New York, Nova Scotia, Newfoundland, Canada, Scotland, England, in the islands of the sea, in France, and Spain, and in nearly every other continental country of Europe that has a coast line. It has some of the most skillful legal assistants that it is possible for money to employ in devising schemes by which these rum runners are permitted to violate the law of the United States. They have a fleet of 32 steamers, trans-Atlantic steamers, carrying intoxicating liquors to the United States. They have 134 sailing boats that are now being used in the transportation of intoxicating liquors to the United States, and besides these steamers and these sailing boats they have hundreds of small motor boats and other small craft which they use as lines of communication between these larger boats that hover out beyond the international line and the coast, to dart into the cities and bays and inlets and rivers on the coast of the United States, and there to land intoxicating liquors against the law.

They have organized in Nova Scotia a corporation designed for no other purpose than to bring into the United States illegally intoxicating liquors. A member of the British nobility is engaged in the sailing of vessels to the United States for the purpose of bringing here illegal liquors, and the best testimony we are able to secure shows that there are being brought into this country every month more than 100,000 cases of intoxicating liquors. This is not merely a question of prohibition. Every man who has been here in this House very long knows my attitude upon that subject. He knows that I supported the eighteenth amendment and the Volstead Act and have voted for every bill that has had as its object the enforcement of the eighteenth amendment. But, my friends, regardless of your position originally upon that, this is a question of whether the dignity and honor of the flag of the United States and its Constitution ought to be maintained, and whether the Constitution of our country is not only to be observed and enforced here, but whether we are going to compel outsiders to respect the Constitution of the United States. These large ships hover out beyond the 3-mile limit and even beyond the 12-mile limit. The latter limit is not yet in effect, although the United States and Great Britain have entered into a treaty fixing a 12-mile limit, but that has not yet been ratified by the Senate.

These large vessels that hover on the outskirts of our coast fly a foreign flag and they hover out there with large quantities of liquor upon them and then send these small rapid motor boats into the coast with their cargo. Now, the gentleman from Texas has complained because the Navy does not do this. The United States Navy has no right to fire upon any ship that hovers beyond the 3-mile limit, no matter what their purpose would be, for if they should fire upon a ship that flies a foreign flag outside of the international limit it would be an act of war.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. I asked not to be interrupted for the present. I will in a few minutes. Now, these big ships do not come in close to the coast, but they hover many miles off the shore, and it would be like sending a hound dog out to catch a flea to send a battleship to catch little motor boats that ply in and out, mostly during the darkness of the night, bringing contraband liquor to the United States.

The Coast Guard Service is doing the best it can. That service has always been the guardian of our shores against smuggling of all kinds, and that applies to the smuggling of diamonds as much as the smuggling of liquor. It refers to the smuggling of any article of commerce prohibited in the United States or upon which a tariff duty is desired to be escaped. So the Coast Guard Service not only protects our shores against smuggling of contraband liquor, but all kinds of commerce that is brought here either that is prohibited itself or upon which it seeks to escape the payment of duties. Now, these smart organizations which have been formed for the purpose of bringing in this liquor have learned that the Coast Guard boats are slow. They have none beyond 10 miles an hour in speed, and some of these smaller boats which bring in liquor have Packard motors in them and go to and from these ships on the outskirts of our shores making from 25 to 30 miles an hour. What chance has an old out-of-date plug boat that makes only 10 miles an hour against a boat of the rum runners that makes from 25 to 30 miles an hour? So that it is absolutely necessary if we are going to keep this contraband liquor from entering the shores of the United States to increase the force of the Coast Guard. The Coast Guard did not solicit this duty. If they had been consulted about it and their wishes had been consulted, they perhaps would not have accepted this service. But they are loyal men and believe in the enforcement of law. That service is an arm of the United States Treasury Department, and that United States Treasury Department is charged with the enforcement of the Federal prohibition law, and it is not only proper, but I think it is the only proper source of power and authority that can prevent the shipment of this liquor into the United States. The Navy is not equipped with the kind of craft necessary to overhaul these motor boats that ply in and out of our inland shore which go out to these big ships 25 miles out and load up. As I say, the Navy is not equipped to chase them. If it had been equipped, all we would have to do would be to transfer 100 of these boats to the Coast Guard where we transfer 20 of the torpedo destroyers that are not in condition to be used, and we have to expend $100,000 on each one of them in order to condition them to prevent the smuggling of liquor into the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BLANTON. I yield the gentleman four additional minutes. I desire to ask him a question, if the gentleman will yield for a question.

Mr. BARKLEY. I will let the gentleman ask it.

Mr. BLANTON. The Coast Guard could fire on ships outside the 12-mile limit and it would not be an act of war——

Mr. BARKLEY. No; the Coast Guard can not do it, but the Coast Guard can fire upon them if they refuse to stop when they are ordered to stop if they get within the 3-mile limit.

Mr. BLANTON. And so could the Navy without committing an act of war.

Mr. BARKLEY. I stated the Navy is not equipped to do this thing and protect the shores and inlets of our coast. That has been the proper function and always has been for more than 100 years of the Coast Guard, and the Coast Guard was established even before the Navy was ever established, and during the 100 years and more it has been its function to protect our shores and inlets against the importation of contraband goods which may endeavor to enter the United States.

Mr. HILL of Maryland. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. I will yield to my distinguished law-enforcement advocate of Maryland.

Mr. HILL of Maryland. The gentleman has just stated that the Navy was not equipped. If the Navy were equipped, why should the Coast Guard——

Mr. BARKLEY. If the gentleman had paid attention, he would have discriminated. I said if the Navy had been equipped with 100 small boats authorized to be constructed, all we would have to do would be to transfer them like we do the 20 torpedo-boat destroyers; but it is not equipped and therefore we can not transfer them, but provide for the construction of new boats——

Mr. HILL of Maryland. But the 20 torpedo-boat destroyers are necessary for the Coast Guard, I understand.

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes; the plan at first was to build 22 of those absolutely new for the Coast Guard, but in view of the fact that the Navy has them, what we have to do is to condition them to operate, and therefore we are transferring them to the Coast Guard in order to save whatever expense we can and provide for their conditioning so they can go in that service.

Mr. HILL of Maryland. The Budget cut down the original estimate for the Coast Guard.

Mr. BARKLEY. I do not know where the suggestion came from with reference to the 20 boats, but it is not material.

Mr. HILL of Maryland. I will call the attention of the gentleman to the hearings.

Mr. BARKLEY. What has that got to do with it?

Mr. HILL of Maryland. It shows that the Coast Guard made much larger demands, which were afterwards cut down.

Mr. BARKLEY. Perhaps they were not aware the Navy had these boats; the Coast Guard is not supposed to know all about the Navy.

Mr. HILL of Maryland. According to the testimony, the Coast Guard knew very little about this matter.

Mr. BARKLEY. Would the gentleman from Maryland vote for this bill if it were authorizing the Navy Department instead of the Coast Guard to enforce the prohibition amendment?

Mr. HILL of Maryland. The gentleman will vote for the bill if it is in the power of the President to use the Coast Guard.

Mr. BARKLEY. Would the gentleman support the bill if it were to make a transfer?

Mr. HILL of Maryland. It could not transfer itself.

Mr. BARKLEY. The gentleman from Maryland is always howling against the law not being enforced, and yet he votes against every bill that seeks to enforce it.

Mr. HILL of Maryland. Why does not the gentleman from Kentucky vote for Mr. BLANTON'S bill if he is sincerely in favor of prohibition?

Mr. BARKLEY. Because it does not accomplish anything. I want to place this responsibility on an arm of the service qualified to perform it.

Mr. HILL of Maryland. If you really want law enforcement, Mr. BLANTON'S bill will get it for you.

Mr. BARKLEY. It is remarkable to see the gentleman from Maryland and the gentleman from Texas lying down in peace together.

Mr. HILL of Maryland. The gentleman from Maryland is in favor of the bill of the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BARKLEY. That makes me suspicious of it.

Mr. WINSLOW. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I think my attitude on the prohibition question is well known to the membership of this House. But there is a clear line of demarcation between a modification of the law and violation of the law. There is a clear difference between coming here, on the one hand, and seeking in a lawful manner to amend the law and, on the other hand, shutting our eyes to the constant, organized, systematic violation of the law. It seems to me that for those of us who are advocating a modification of the enforcement law we can do nothing else but to vote for every proposition that is brought into this House for the enforcement of the law. We believe, some of us, that this law is impossible of enforcement, but we are ready—at least I am—to give you every opportunity that you ask for, and give it a fair trial. [Applause.]

Now the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON], of course, is extreme and ridiculous, for the reason that it would put this country under martial law. You can not turn over to the military forces of the country the enforcement of civil law. But if the Coast Guard wants to assume the responsibility and these boats are available, why turn them over to the Coast Guard.

The gentleman from Maryland, who has assumed the leadership of the so-called "wet" movement in this House, I believe is in error in opposing this measure. It seems to me that it presents an opportunity that we ought to have, to see whether or not the people of this country want prohibition. I personally would like to see, for a period of six months or a period of a year, absolute strict enforcement, and I would like to see some of our dry friends running around the country with their tongues hanging out, asking for a drink. [Laughter.]

I would be willing to put a gold-lace uniform on my genial friend from Texas [Mr. BLANTON], and put him in command of the fleet out there, and then commission my friend from Georgia [Mr. UPSHAW] as a general of the Army, and put him up on the Canadian border. I believe the enforcement of this law ought to be put in the hands of men who are in favor of it and who are honest.

Mr. UPSHAW. All right. I agree with you.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The temptation incident to this service is great; your enforcement agents are underpaid. If you want enforcement, give the head of the department a salary of $100,000 a year, and you should give your man in New York a salary of $100,000 a year. You should pay your prohibition agents a decent salary, so that they will not be tempted. You try to honestly enforce this law and they will know whether the people of the United States want prohibition or not. I believe this measure is along these lines. The Coast Guard say they will stop this smuggling. You know the smuggling is going on. I do not know what purpose Haynes has in mind.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SPEAKS].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio is recognized for two minutes.

Mr. SPEAKS. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I want to offer just a few words additional, in line with the thought suggested by the chairman of the committee a few moments ago. This bill proposes that the Navy Department shall turn over to the Treasury Department certain vessels adapted to the use of the Coast Guard in the enforcement of the law.

First, I want to qualify as being in favor of the most rigid enforcement of all laws relating to prohibition.

Now, the distinguished gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] draws a picture of a fleet of vessels leaving England, for instance, loaded with liquor, with the avowed purpose of bringing it into the United States contrary to the laws of this country. There is no secrecy regarding their activities. They boldly and defiantly make mockery of our dignity and authority. All I am urging when suggesting that the Navy be employed in preventing such operations is this: First, whenever the President of the United States deems that an emergency exists or any condition warranting such action, he is authorized to employ such personnel and equipment of the Navy as may be necessary to properly enforce the laws.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS].

Mr. TYDINGS. Gentlemen, I have only two minutes, so I will ask not to be interrupted. I do not want to speak strictly on the bill, but each time prohibition comes up my native State—Maryland—seems to figure in the argument. I would like to take these two minutes to tell you that my State is founded on religious liberty. We do not believe, within reason, in having our religion and our morals legislated into us. [Applause.] We want the right to pursue a certain amount of individual freedom, and while we are a temperance State, second to no State in the Union, we do object to having forced upon us things in which we can not see the least sin.

We feel over in that State that it is not so evil to sit down quietly in one's home and to have a good glass of wine or a cold mint julep, a few friends around, and touch some of the softer, sweeter, and cultural side of life. My State does not want nor ask for a return of the saloon nor the unbridled sale of liquor. We are not hypocrites who vote dry and drink all the liquor we can get. Thank God, we have the manhood in that State, and we are not like so many of these prohibitionists who everlastingly preach and vote dry but who drink anything they can lay their hands on. [Applause.]

You may charge us with any crime; but reserve to us at least the compliment of being honest men and women, with courage enough to face the facts and govern ourselves accordingly. We feel, in view of the widespread disregard of this law in the United States, that a good many States have shown they have not the courage and have not the candor which the citizens of Maryland have. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BLANTON. The parliamentary situation is such that while I can not agree with the gentlemen, I am forced to yield to them. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. CELLER].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York is recognized for three minutes.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Chairman, it seems that because of prohibition we must lose some of our senses. I say that a careful and rigid reading of this bill shows that it is merely a stalking horse for the use of the military and naval forces of the country. We speak of mine sweepers and torpedo boats, and they are engines of war.

What are the objections found in the Constitution, concerning which the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] asked us, and nobody seemed to answer him? I reserved my right to answer until I had the floor. We find in Story on the Constitution that—

> The power to raise armies is an indispensable incident to the power to declare war.

And when the term "armies" is used it always means the Navy and the Marine Corps.

Let us go back to what Hamilton said in the Federalist, and I also quote from Story on the Constitution:

> It was said that Congress, having an unlimited power to raise and support armies, might, if in their opinion the general welfare required it, keep large armies constantly on foot and thus exhaust the resources of the United States. There is no control on Congress as to numbers, stations, or government of them. They may billet them on the people at pleasure. Such an unlimited authority is most dangerous and in its principles despotic for, being unbounded, it must lead to despotism. We shall, therefore, live under a government of military force. In respect to times of peace it was suggested that there is no necessity for having a standing army, which had always been held under such circumstances to be fatal to public rights and political freedom.

I need not comment on the language used by Hamilton, but let me quote something else that is found in Story on the Constitution with reference to what the Attorney General said about the unconstitutionality of the bill before us:

> It may be admitted that standing armies may prove dangerous to the State. But it is equally true that the want of them may also prove dangerous to the State. What, then, is to be done? The true course is to check the undue exercise of the power, not to withhold it. This the Constitution has attempted to do by providing that "no appropriation of money to that use shall be for a longer term than two years." Thus, unless the necessary supplies are voted by the representatives of the people every two years, the whole establishment must fail. Congress may, indeed, by an act for this purpose disband a standing army at any time, or vote the supplies only for one year or for a shorter period.

What do we find in this bill with reference to an appropriation for these engines of war, these torpedo boats, these mine sweepers, and these revenue cutters? The bill itself is woefully lacking with reference to the restrictions embodied in the Constitution, which says in no uncertain terms that there must be that limit.

Now, the provision for the building of these torpedo boats and the loaning of the ships by the Navy is for an indefinite period of time, and the bill would be declared unconstitutional on that ground alone, because there is no restriction. So that the act is unconstitutional and would be declared so by Chief Justice Taft, because he has already stated that the use of the naval forces for this purpose is unconstitutional; that the military forces shall not be used to enforce civil laws.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield six minutes to the distinguished gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SHALLENBERGER].

Mr. WINSLOW. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SHALLENBERGER].

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I agree with those who believe that if it were possible the Navy should be used in order to stop liquor smuggling and compel obedience to our laws. I believe it was Henry Ford who first made the announcement that to enforce the law against smuggling in this country he would use the Navy of the United States in order to compel obedience to our flag and to our laws. But since the Attorney General of the United States has rendered his opinion that the Navy can not be used, then the President is compelled to come and ask Congress to give him this authority.

This is a bill to increase the Coast Guard by the addition of 20 destroyers as battleships of the line, together with a fleet of more than 300 light cruisers, scout ships, and fast motor boats. They are to wage a warfare the like of which has never been known before.

The base of the supplies of the enemy is on the high seas beyond the 12-mile limit. But under international law we can not attack that base. The navy that we must contend with is a mosquito fleet operating from our own shores that sails the sea within the 12-mile limit. This enemy fleet is manned by pirates, cutthroats, and thieves and financed with money furnished largely by our rich and influential citizens.

This new navy is made necessary because of the smuggling of liquor into the United States from the high seas. This week the public press carried this story:

> NEW YORK, March 6.—The dry navy made a complete tour of the rum fleet to-day. It listed the names, estimated capacity, and registry of each ship and announced that the cargoes aggregated 224,000 cases, worth about $11,000,000 at rum-row prices. The Coast Guard reported it the biggest liquor fleet off the port of New York since the first group of tramp schooners established a market there 18 months ago.

The smuggling from this fleet is done in open defiance of both our Constitution and our laws.

Since the Attorney General has ruled that the Navy can not be used for this purpose we must equip the Coast Guard to do the job, though it will cost millions to furnish the personnel and the ships. The President estimates the expense for men and ships at $13,853,989.

The plan proposed is to take only 20 destroyers from the Navy. The balance of the fleet that will be used to enforce the law will be new vessels built especially for this service. As a matter of economy, I should like to have seen more of the lighter naval craft, eagle boats and submarine chasers, and so forth, used for this purpose. Although we have spent billions in building a Navy in the past 10 years, we apparently have nothing suitable to guard our coast except the 20 destroyers above referred to.

The fact that the President is compelled to ask for this bill in order that he may enforce obedience to liquor laws is only another evidence of the rising tide of defiant disobedience to all law that is spreading throughout our land. The law-abiding citizen is no longer safe at home or on the street. An army of law violators overrun the land. Rum smugglers line our coasts and defy and break our laws at every opportunity.

But it is not only the rum runner who defies the law. Justice is apparently no longer feared either by high or low. Lawbreaking increases in an astounding manner because punishment in America is neither certain nor severe. The common criminal neither respects nor fears the law, and many of those who hold high places and should be an example to the rest lead off in violation of the law.

To such a pass has it come that every day you hear Members of this House say that they fear the confidence of the people in their Government is being undermined. The leaders of public thought who mold and determine public opinion in this country are primarily to blame if the people are losing confidence in the sacredness of the law and our ability to enforce it.

I agree with a great Republican from California who in a speech to the citizens of Michigan the other day said, "What we need right now in order to command a wholesome respect for law and to put the fear of God into a lot of highbinders in high places is a man like Theodore Roosevelt at the helm of this Government." He would get the grafters and stampede the law violators. If we would blow a few of these rum runners out of the water and demonstrate that our gunners can still shoot straight and that to defy the American flag and what it stands for means certain destruction, that rum fleet would soon seek safer waters. Whenever a great majority of American citizens cultivate and show a proper respect for law we will not need a war fleet and an army to enforce our statutes and compel aliens to obey the Constitution of the United States.

No man is so great nor is any selfish interest strong enough to long defy and disobey the law when once it is upon the statute books of this Nation. I admit that disobedience to law is fast becoming a custom in this country. We should not complain if the news that is daily carried by the newspapers compels the people to believe that the rottenness once complained of as being in the State of Denmark has been transplanted to the city of Washington.

The bootlegger will go out of business when the leading citizen ceases to be his best customer. Only those with plenty of means and position sufficient to offer protection can afford a personal bootlegger at present prices. The greatest power on earth for the enforcement of law is the demand of a decent public opinion that decent men must obey the law. In his speech to the correspondents the other night President Coolidge quoted the celebrated statement of Lord Bryce that in America "public opinion is the law" and confirmed the truth of the epigram.

Let me illustrate this by an incident in which Roosevelt himself was the main factor. The President of the United States has greater autocratic power than any other ruler on earth. Roosevelt himself was the very embodiment of courage and action, yet he never countenanced evasion of the law. On the contrary, he compelled obedience to it at every opportunity.

He sent a special message to the Fifty-seventh Congress asking for legislation that would stop the railroads of the country from giving rebates and free transportation to favored shippers and politicians. The railroads were then all powerful in politics. The giving of their favors for business and political reasons had become a great abuse, an open scandal throughout the land.

Recognizing all this, Roosevelt did not hesitate to challenge their power when convinced it was adverse to the public good. In response to his message the Senate appointed a committee to consider the question and report back a recommendation to the Congress of the United States.

The committee of the Senate called before it the presidents and managers of the principal railway systems of the country.

The representatives of the leading railway companies were heard from first. One after another they came before the committee and said, "Gentlemen, we are guilty; most guilty of giving rebates to shippers and passes to politicians." But every railroad officer, while admitting the offense, insisted that it was the custom and practice of railroads to do so, and that they could not stop it and retain their business. They further admitted that they knew of no remedy.

After all the greater magnates had confessed, Mr. James Stillwell, of Minneapolis, Minn., at that time the manager of a minor western road, was called upon to testify. He made a statement to this effect:

Gentlemen, we all admit that we are guilty of giving rebates and passes to secure business and protect our investments. We further admit that it ought to stop. We all know it is in violation of the law. You are now seeking to stop this evil by law, but the remedy is not to be found in the enactment of another law. What we need is a proper respect for the laws we now have.

The trouble is that in America those in high places do not themselves show a proper obedience to law. We know that to give a man a pass, whether for business or political reasons, is a form of rebate. For more than 20 years we have had a law upon our statute books which makes it a misdemeanor, punishable by a fine, for any man not in the employ of a railroad to give or take a railroad pass. And yet the Members of Congress who enacted the law and the President who signed the bill and the judges of the court who would have to interpret it if anyone ever invoked the law, violate the law every time they ride upon a railroad train. How can you expect the average citizen to have any respect for law when the men who make the laws, the President who should enforce the laws, and those who must interpret them lead off in violation of the law?

Let me refer you to a country where public opinion compels obedience to law. In England there is a King, and you would think that if anyone in that land shall be above the law it is the King. But because they have a law like ours every time the King of England rides he pays his fare, just the same as the humblest citizen in the land. And the members of the Parliament of England serve without pay. We pay our Senators and Congressmen $7,500 a year and mileage, yet such is the power of public opinion in Great Britain that no member of Parliament would dare to violate the law any more than he would dare to pick your purse upon the street and then expect to be received into the company of honest men.

Then Mr. Stillwell pointed toward the other end of the Avenue and said:

"I hope the brave man in the White House will have the courage to show the world that an American President can be as obedient to law as a German Emperor or an English King."

Within a week the President publicly announced that hereafter whenever he rode upon a railroad train he would pay his fare. Later Congress made an appropriation of $25,000 to pay the traveling expenses of the Executive, and every public official in the United States and every governor had to follow in the footsteps of the President. What was needed was not new law but a new obedience to existing law.

But the respect for law that Stillwell referred to was not always the rule in Great Britain. England was long cursed with corruption in high places. The departments of justice became corrupt. But Englishmen finally found a way to cleanse their Government and abolish grafting in high places.

The Lord Chancellor of England is the ranking law officer of the Crown and stands at the head of the Department of Justice. Originally he was a dignitary of the church as well as the highest judicial authority in the interpretation of the law. He still sits on the woolsack and presides over the House of Lords.

Many of the mightiest men in English history have been proud to hold that high position. But, to their shame, it finally became a common practice through a long period of years for them to accept bribes, under the guise of presents, for the favors they might bestow. They had many places of power and profit at their command. Even Francis Bacon, the "wisest, brightest, mightiest" intellect the Anglo-Saxon race has ever produced, confessed that while Chancellor he had taken bribes.

But the evil still persisted and grew until the time when Thomas Parker, Lord Macclesfield, was appointed Lord Chancellor by George I. Then the South Sea bubble broke and a period of financial orgy like that experienced in America, following the World War, came to a climax and blew the lid off the teapot under the woolsack of the Lord Chancellor.

The Lord Chancellor was impeached by the commons for malfeasance in office and put upon trial by his peers in the House of Lords. Witnesses were brought before the lords and it developed that through a long period of years the practice had arisen of giving the Lord Chancellor a present when he bestowed a favor either by court decision or by the gift of place and power.

Originally the presents had been things of little value. Later they had become fine raiment or jewels and finally money. One man testified as follows, and the story reads as though it might have happened but yesterday, judging from reports of the Federal grand juries at Chicago or New York:

He said he knew that a man by the name of Cottingham was the place broker of the Lord Chancellor. He called upon him at his rooms. The witness said he told Cottingham he wanted a position which the Lord Chancellor had at his disposal. The man who had the ear of the Department of Justice said, "You know it is customary to give his lordship a present when he makes such an appointment." We can almost hear him saying, "His lordship's campaign expenses are enormous." The applicant said he knew it was the custom. The agent of the court asked him if he had made up his mind as to the present he would give for the place and the applicant replied that he had determined to give the Chancellor £4,000. Cottingham told him he had better think more deeply upon the subject and give it more consideration.

The witness said he went outside for a short time and then came back and said that upon more mature consideration he had made up his mind to raise the gift to £5,000. The place broker was evidently something of a wag, so he told the plum seeker that his lordship was "very fond of guineas, that guineas were handsomer," and that if he would make the present 5,000 guineas he would speak to his lordship about giving him the place.

The man testified that the next day he brought the 5,000 guineas in a basket to the agent of the Lord Chancellor. The agent took the basketful of money to the Chancellor's house, and that he later brought the basket back again, but there was not money in the basket when it was returned.

There were many other witnesses with tales of similar contributions. When the testimony was finished the House of Lords rendered instant judgment against the head of the Department of Justice of the British Crown. They unanimously found the Lord Chancellor guilty of high treason against the country, and the King stripped him of all position and power, took away from him his lands and palaces, and levied against him a fine of $150,000, and put him under the further penalty of paying the losses of the wards of his court, and he was committed to the Tower until the fines were paid.

The promptness with which the lords acted and the penalty inflicted ended the selling of offices and disgrace of the courts of Great Britain. They have since become the model and the admiration of all countries that love liberty and know the value of certain and speedy justice.

The crying need in America to-day is that justice shall be prompt in action and certain in her decrees and punishments. The symbol of justice is a blindfolded figure with the scales in one hand and a drawn sword in the other. If I could put that figure into action, I would have her drop the scales, remove the bandage from her eyes, and take the broadsword in both hands and begin to smite those who betray the trust of the people and defy our constitutions and our laws.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] has six minutes remaining.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I reserve that time. I understood the gentleman from Massachusetts wanted to use some time now.

Mr. WINSLOW. I understood the gentleman to say he wanted to yield to some one now.

Mr. BLANTON. I have six minutes. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TAGUE].

Mr. TAGUE. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, I do not intend to approach this subject upon the question of prohibition. The House knows full well my attitude on that question. I rise for another purpose altogether. I know and you know that every time the question of prohibition comes up on the floor of this House immediately there arises a hue and cry, and the prohibition enforcement officer can get anything he wants. I rise for another purpose, and that purpose is whether or not the lives and the property of the men interested in the merchant marine of this Nation are of as much importance as is the question of chasing a few cheap rum runners up and down the Atlantic coast. During the war the United States Navy took from the Coast Guard some of their best ships. They were sunk and destroyed, and from that time up to this minute the Coast Guard has been appealing to Congress for money with which to build ships, and Congress in that time has practically failed to hear their cry. True, they have given them small appropriations, but here you are asked to appropriate, with the passage of this bill, or at least you will be asked to appropriate soon, more than $13,000,000 for protection against rum runners, while the business men along the Atlantic and the Pacific coasts are to-day appealing in vain to Congress to give them ships that will protect the lives of the fishermen and sailors on the seas. Go on the Atlantic coast, and on that great graveyard of the ocean talk to the men who go to sea for useful life, and they will say to you, as I say to you, that the risks to-day upon the sea are greater than ever because they have no protection at all. There is one ship of the Coast Guard down in Halifax and one ship up along the coast breaking ice and not another ship of the United States doing duty between New York and Bar Harbor. But we can get money to give to enforce prohibition. We can get money to chase rum runners. We can go into the Navy and say to the Navy, "Give your ships to chase rum runners up and down the coast," but we can not protect the father of the little innocent children who is risking his life every day in the building up of our transportation and performing honest manual labor.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, this is a bill that may cost at least from $13,000,000 to $20,000,000, and I ask unanimous consent that the time be extended 20 minutes on each side.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I object.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the other three minutes remaining to me.

Mr. WINSLOW. Mr. Chairman, I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Montana [Mr. LEAVITT].

Mr. LEAVITT. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, the issue in this matter is to me a very definite one; one that I am glad to approach in a very brief way. In his Farewell Address, the Father of his Country, George Washington, makes the statement that the basis of our political system is the right of the people to make and to alter their constitutions of government, but that the Constitution which at any time exists is sacredly obligatory upon all. He says that the very right of the people to establish government presupposes the duty of every individual to obey the established government. This, then, is the one issue which is before us at this time. The President of the United States has come before us with a statement made in this room, that free government has no greater menace than disrespect for authority and continual violation of law, and that to prevent smuggling of liquors the Coast Guard should be greatly strengthened.

That is the whole issue here. It is a matter of whether we will place in the hands of the President of the United States, where the Constitution reposes the duty of enforcing the laws, that measure of strength which he says should be placed there. I believe in prohibition, but it makes no difference whether one believes in it or not, prohibition has been regularly written into the Constitution and, as George Washington has stated, it therefore becomes sacredly obligatory upon every one of us. I am to-day for the reporting out and the passing of this measure, in order that our form of government may be made more safe, in order that the President may get this power through enlarging the Coast Guard, and in order that the prohibition violations coming to us through smuggling and otherwise may be stopped to the greatest possible degree. [Applause.]

Mr. WINSLOW. Mr. Chairman, I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HUDSON].

Mr. HUDSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HUDSON. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, it seems to me that the voices raised in opposition to this most important piece of legislation have taken two channels of thought, one expressed by my distinguished friend from Texas [Mr. BLANTON], who evidently would substitute his resolution for this bill, and the other by the distinguished gentleman from Maryland [Mr. HILL], who would impose in the way of law enforcement every obstacle that he could.

Mr. HILL of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUDSON. I can not yield. I want to bring to the attention of this committee the thought that this measure is not usurping any of the powers of the Navy or transferring any of those powers. It is strengthening the Coast Guard which we have, and which is here for certain specific duties. I quote from the statement of Admiral Billard:

> So there has grown up a condition where the dignity of the United States is openly flouted by foreign shipping.
> The Coast Guard through a century and a quarter of its history has firmly crystallized its standard of doing its duty and carrying out the orders that Congress or the President or the Secretary of the Navy gives it. The service properly does not consider the wisdom of the law or of the order, but intends to the fullest of its ability to carry out that law or that order.

In other words, the Coast Guard comes to you asking for this appropriation to carry out the orders of this Congress through the years back and the years to come.

Another point I think we should take into consideration is that if we pass, as it is expected we will, a new immigration law, the Coast Guard will have the added duty of enforcing that law. If we enact as we hope to more stringent narcotic laws, the Coast Guard must enforce them.

The charge is that this legislation contemplates outstanding expenditures; well, what if it does? The public is willing to pay any proper price to drive the rum runner from our territorial waters. The question of using the Navy is not potential to this discussion. This country does not care who wipes out the rum runner or what ships he uses. It is willing to pay for service.

That there is a decided change in the country as evidenced by the reaction in feeling from the irresponsible recklessness of a year ago to the comparative lack of flavor which thousands of people who are not classed as "drys" are manifestly finding in quips at the expense of the Volstead Act. An increasing number are commencing to consider them in about as good taste as jokes regarding murder. The situation is too serious to laugh about.

Sentiment also is crystallizing toward a determination that there must be an end of what amounts to a conspiracy among a considerable number of the judges, prosecutors, police officials, and executives of the country to defeat the provisions of the dry law either by treating it as a dead letter or by giving it manifestly hostile interpretations so that the difficulties in the way of its enforcement are materially increased beyond the difficulties in the way of the enforcement of any other criminal act. Unless a change "comes over the face of the moon" in this respect there is a prospect that something is going to drop and hit some public officials who have been laboring under the impression that they are "standing in" with the voters.

May I quote you the words of Sir Auckland Geddes, former British ambassador: "I don't think the people of England recognize amid the mass of stories of violation of the prohibition laws of the United States how strong the feeling of the best minds of the best people of America is on the subject of prohibition." And whether the direct and indirect results of prohibition sum up more of ill than of good, as is so persistently urged by the "wets," the general attitude of the country seems to be in favor of prohibition. It sometimes may be difficult to distinguish the real desire of the people as distinguished from individual opinions, but there can be no doubt of the people's will in one respect—that of law enforcement. Much as some of the people abhor prohibition, they abhor unrestricted crime more. They see the logic of the argument that no law can be flouted without causing all law to be endangered. Therefore, they agree that the prohibition law should be enforced so long as it is a law.

It is impossible even for the American who is least inclined to put his own weight behind the eighteenth amendment, most loath to forego personal indulgence, to ignore the fact that the prosperity of the United States has not been due to any increase in her foreign trade, against which the exchange rate operates; that we are consuming more of our own products. He can not dodge or fail to take account of the fact that the men who make America's automobiles are driving them, that our silks and fine textiles are finding buyers among our own people; that sober workmen are consuming a larger portion of our manufactured products than ever before in our history.

Yes, prohibition pleads guilty to being a good business investment. Virtue pays a nation better than vice, even if the vice is legalized and taxed for revenue as was liquor. Banks, insurance companies, realty men, merchants, manufacturers, autoists, theaters—in brief, every business interest except the undertakers, jailers, and executioners can say with Roger W. Babson, "The great improvement in business which followed the war was very largely the result of the influence of prohibition." Why should not business men support prohibition?

He knows, if he reads his daily newspaper, that we are the only Nation in the world without an unemployment problem. The sums we once invested in the destructive distilling and brewing business now operate factories, mines, and railroads.

Our school life has been lengthened. The family purse today suffices for the family support, now that the barrooms are closed, without the children adding their pittance. Revived ambition in the home has sent to high school, academies, preparatory schools, and colleges thousands who in our wet years lacked the means or the encouragement to study, or both.

In the factory, the counting room, the store, the mines, on the farm, in the great open spaces, in the home, in the schoolroom, in the church, there is a great, quiet, resistless force in motion that is lifting America to a place of unchallenged leadership of the world.

The uncertainty is not whether national prohibition shall become an American institution. That is already decided. It is how rapidly America shall move toward universal observance of a principle that has been written into her character, and through this to a civilization that inevitably will set a new mark in human attainment.

Are you for me or against me?
Said the flag as it went by.
We are for you, we are for you!
Cried the people in reply.
We are ready when you need us!
We will follow when you lead us,
We have pledged our hearts' devotion,
Said the people in reply.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. WINSLOW. Mr. Chairman, I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON].

[By unanimous consent, Mr. CRAMTON was granted leave to extend his remarks in the RECORD.]

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, the case at point has been very admirably stated to-day by a number of gentlemen, particularly by my friend from New York Mr. LAGUARDIA, and a moment ago by the gentleman from Montana [Mr. LEAVITT].

Gentlemen, in the four minutes granted me I just want to challenge your attention to these realities of the situation. If you will consult the hearings of the first deficiency appropriation bill in connection with the proposed appropriation of money for this same purpose, beginning on page 646 of the hearings you will find a statement by Commander Root of well authenticated facts that is intensely interesting and fully justifies this bill. On page 647 of his statement he discusses the organization that confronts the Government of the United States, and the duty and function of the Coast Guard with reference to it. He says:

EXTENT OF LIQUOR SMUGGLING; LOCATION AND ACTIVITIES OF RUM FLEET.

Commander ROOT. This work is, above all others, the fundamental duty of the Coast Guard. The term "smuggling" is used advisedly because the work involves prevention of illegal introduction into the United States of all kinds of merchandise, of aliens, of narcotics, and of intoxicating liquors. With prohibition enforcement the Coast Guard is most decidedly not concerned. We are interested in that matter simply as good citizens. The Coast Guard is not now equipped properly to deal with the prevention of smuggling in its present magnitude.

In order to determine our needs an estimate of the situation—past, present, and future—was made some time ago and the matter now under discussion is deduced from that estimate.

That our needs may be understood, I shall set before you, as briefly as possible, the present situation. For the sake of brevity I shall refer to the smuggler and his organization as the "enemy."

The mission of the enemy is to make money. His motive is cupidity. His operations are carried on by a force limited only by opportunities to use it. His legal and technical advisers are persons of the highest skill, unhampered by principles of any kind. He employs seagoing people, some of desperate character, many of whom served in the allied armies and navies during the World War. These people are armed and will fight if there is a chance of advantage by so doing.

Whenever possible, the enemy resorts to bribery to disorganize our forces. Our mission, the mission of the Government and the Coast Guard, is to make his operations profitless in order to deny him capital for further operations.

His high seas force at the present time consists of 34 steamers and 182 sailing vessels, ranging in size from 35 tons to 3,000 tons. Some of these vessels are capable of speeds up to 19 knots. The majority of them fly foreign flags.

His auxiliary craft for making shore contact consist of several hundred gasoline-driven craft, about 30 per cent of which are good for 25 knots. Most of this force flies the American flag. Occasionally he has used aircraft during the past year.

He maintains a bribery fund and has a shore organization for obtaining supplies, marketing contraband, and for the collection and dissemination of intelligence. He obtains his contraband from many ports in Great Britain, France, Germany, Spain, Canada, the Canadian maritime Provinces, Habana, Santiago de Cuba, Jamaica, and Grand Cayman. He maintains advanced bases at St. Johns, Newfoundland; St. Pierre, Miquelon; the Azores Islands; Bermuda; and the Bahamas. His general operations are believed to be directed from New York, with offices of considerable authority in the Bahamas and Nova Scotia. At Yarmouth, Nova Scotia, a large corporation has just been formed with M. M. Gardner as secretary. Reports indicate that the new firm intends to engage in smuggling on a large scale.

Intelligence is transmitted between his forces afloat and ashore by dispatches in codes and ciphers, and by couriers when extreme secrecy is necessary. Liaison between New York and Europe is not believed to be complete, but is fairly well established. The so-called "Rum Row" off New York is maintained ostensibly as a good business proposition, but principally as a diversion to hold to that point the attention of as many of the Coast Guard vessels as possible.

Large amounts of contraband are believed to be entering through Long Island Sound, Delaware and Chesapeake Bays, along the coast of Florida, at the mouths of the Mississippi, and, to a less extent, at places where a long and dangerous land haul is involved. We have record of great activity off Cape Ann, off the coast between Marthas Vineyard Island and Montauk Point, on the coast between New York and Chesapeake entrance, along the coast between Cape Canaveral and Key West, off Mobile and the Delta of the Mississippi, and at Galveston.

VOLUME OF SMUGGLING.

As to the volume of liquor smuggling he says, on page 649 in the hearings:

From reliable, but very incomplete, secret sources abroad I have information of the following shipments from northern European—mostly British—ports since January, 1922. The quantities are, in round numbers, 136,600 equivalent cases of 3 gallons each, taken from manifests.

I say "equivalent cases" because where the quantities have been reported in gallons we have reduced it to the quantity usually contained in a case, so that the units will all be the same—1,110,000 equivalent cases, shipped in 37 ships. Total for 26 months, 1,246,600 cases, or practically 48,000 cases per month from northern Europe alone.

Of the above, during the last three months of last year—October, November, and December—63,000 cases were shipped from Scotland and 133,000 cases from Antwerp, or 196,000 in three months, which is about 63,000 cases a month.

In considering these last figures it should be remembered that they include only the known shipments, ascertained by our few scattered agents, and include but two countries. Mature consideration leads me to believe that the direct shipments from Europe alone to the United States amount to not less than 80,000 cases per month.

Since last May, or during the past nine months, 724,000 cases have arrived off New York entrance in the steamers Bernard M., Bru, Butetown, Gerbercillier, Istar, Johnstown, L'Auroch, Lutzen, Lynntown, Obernai, Papyrus, Strand Hill, Ulv, Wyke Regis, and in the German schooner Emmie Freidrich and the Dutch schooner Zechond. This amounts to 80,000 cases per month and does not include the thousands of cases brought to our shores by British and French sailing vessels from the enemy advance bases.

There are assembled at the present time off Boston two steamers and five schooners, with cargoes conservatively estimated at 16,500 cases; off Block Island Sound, one steamer and five sailing vessels, with 28,500 cases; off New York entrance, three steamers and six sailing vessels, with cargoes estimated at 124,000 cases; off the Delta of the Mississippi, three sailing vessels, with cargoes estimated at 4,000 cases. I have the names of these ships here, but I will not take time to read them.

That the actual business of smuggling and whisky peddling along our coasts is rapidly increasing is shown by the fact that 56 new vessels have entered the trade since October 1 of last year and 6 within the last week.

THE PROBLEM.

Further on he summarizes the great problem which is before us, that which the United States is confronting:

From what has just been said it should be apparent that—

(a) The enemy is engaged in open and organized warfare on the Constitution.

(b) He is practically unhampered in his operations by this or any other Government.

Because the Coast Guard has not to-day the equipment to take a sufficient part in the stopping of this smuggling for which the Coast Guard was organized. He goes on:

(c) He is introducing into this country at least 100,000 cases per month by way of the Atlantic and Gulf coasts.

In considering this matter, the prohibition feature or liquor question should be eliminated from the mind. Were the traffic confined to diamonds, for example, its bad effect would be the same.

Nonenforcement of the law is bringing the National Government and the very Constitution itself into contempt, and, what is almost equally bad, is causing an ever-increasing flow of money into the coffers of the underworld. This money is being used to finance all sorts of criminal ventures, and is, I believe, one of the prime causes of the increase of crime.

Mr. GALLIVAN. Who is saying this?

Commander ROOT. I am saying this.

However, it seems to me, that in preparing to arrive at a decision, that we should divest our minds of even the latter consideration and reduce the question to its most simple terms, those involving only the support of the Constitution.

As this statement and further investigation can lead to but one conclusion, it is expected that the full force, for which we have asked, will be provided without delay. This force, by itself alone, will not be sufficient. Old laws must be strengthened and new laws written.

There is the problem we are confronting. The facts are not vague or in question, but certain and definite and compelling.

THE SOLUTION.

There may be other ways of doing this thing or helping at it. I am one that believes the Army and the Navy would be the gainers if obliged to aid wherever and whenever possible. But the bill pending represents a tangible, carefully worked out plan in which I have confidence and it is no time for chimera chasing. Read further from the hearings from which I have been quoting, on page 693 of the deficiency bill hearings Admiral Billard says:

Mr. GALLIVAN. If you get all this money and all these men and all these ships, are you able to tell this committee when you will be able to clear the seas of rum runners and give us law enforcement on the sea?

Admiral BILLARD. I am not able to tell the committee or anyone else that.

Mr. GALLIVAN. Is there anybody that can?

Admiral BILLARD. I am not able to.

Mr. GALLIVAN. Do you think that we will get law enforcement if we make this appropriation to you of approximately $14,000,000—all these ships and all these men?

Admiral BILLARD. Yes, sir.

Mr. GALLIVAN. You do?

Admiral BILLARD. As far as the importation of liquor from the sea is concerned.

Here is a solution within our grasp. The pending deficiency appropriation bill has the money to do the things here authorized. It is no time to chase off after any Navy will-o'-the-wisp. There are two great sources for illicit liquor that handicap enforcement of the law—one, the diversion of permitted alcohol from proper to improper use; the other, smuggled liquors from abroad. This bill is needed to dry up one of these sources.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CRAMTON. May I have one minute?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield the gentleman one minute.

Mr. CRAMTON. Now, that is the problem facing us; and, with that necessity and with this clear solution, why can not Members, like Mr. BLANTON and myself, who believe prohibition is effective if you make its enforcement effective; why can not we stand with Major LAGUARDIA in defending a practical program for its enforcement?

Mr. BLANTON. Because he is for 2.75 per cent beer, and I am not.

Mr. CRAMTON. To-day he is right, and the gentleman from Texas is wrong.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I remind you again that in 1807 on March the 2d, when our Government was weak and not strong, this Congress gave to the President the right to use the Navy to stop the smuggling of slaves into this country, and provided a forfeiture of vessels caught by the Navy. And again on July 13, 1861, this Congress again passed an act entitled, "to further provide for the collection of duties," and so forth, and gave to the President the right to use the Army and Navy and provided a forfeiture of ships caught. If we could do it then we can do it now. What does this bill provide? It provides that we shall add 175 extra commissioned officers and 418 extra warrant officers and 3,789 extra men to the Coast Guard under the Secretary of the Treasury, mind you. It is with him whether or not he shall enforce the law, and I have not confidence in him enforcing the prohibition act. I am for giving the President the Navy. If you increase this force, not by 4,282 men as proposed, if you increase it by 20,000 men in the Coast Guard and put it where it is now, under the Secretary of the Treasury's office, you will not have prohibition law enforcement; but if you give the President the Navy he is going to enforce the law and going to stop it. Why, the gentleman from Kentucky said the Navy would not be able to shoot at vessels out 12 miles; neither can the Coast Guard. Everything that the Coast Guard can do the Navy can do, and the Navy has better judgment about such things; it has more sense of propriety about such things; it knows more about what the results of its acts would be than the Coast Guard; and I am in favor of giving the President the Navy because ultimately we are going to have to do that to stop smuggling, and we are wasting the people's time and money on this bill.

If you gentlemen will read my Resolution 113, you will see just how strong I am for strict enforcement of all prohibition laws. If you will read my Joint Resolution 116, you will see just how much thought and study I have given to this question of strict enforcement of prohibition laws. If you will read my Joint Resolution 120, you will see that I have spent much time in presenting proper legislation seeking to enforce the prohibition laws. And if you will pass them and also pass my resolution that I read you when beginning this debate, House Joint Resolution 119, the prohibition laws will be enforced, and we will not have to add 4,282 extra men and officers to the pay roll as is proposed by this bill.

Mr. WINSLOW. Mr. Chairman, we have had a very liberal discussion of this bill, and if anybody has followed what has been said he has had an opportunity to either know about it or become confused. [Laughter.] I enjoyed, as most all of you did, the panoramic geographic lesson we had as to the numerous whereases and be it resolved, and so forth, and I admit I was not able to go as fast as the picture. We have but one point: Are we going to stand by a department of this Government, from the Treasury down, in an effort to enforce the law or are we not?

Now, the Navy may be able to do it better. The Coast and Geodetic Survey with the Navy may be able to do it better, and a lot of things may be better. But the problem now is, Shall we help them to do this business in accordance with their best judgment, and do it now? That is all there is to it. [Applause and cries of "Read!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Navy is authorized to transfer to the Department of the Treasury, for the use of the Coast Guard, such vessels of the Navy, with their outfits and armaments, as can be spared by the Navy and as are adapted to the use of the Coast Guard.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, and I give notice that if the amendment is adopted I shall move to strike out the balance of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report. Will the gentleman indicate where he would like to have his amendment come in the bill?

Mr. BLANTON. I offer it as a substitute for the first paragraph, after the enacting clause.

The CHAIRMAN. For the first section of the bill?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes. Strike out the first section and insert this in lieu thereof.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BLANTON: Page 1, strike out all of lines 3 to 7 inclusive, and insert in lieu thereof the following: "That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to use and employ the entire naval and military forces of the United States, or so much of any of the above as he may deem necessary in suppressing all unlawful smuggling into the United States and in suppressing all rebellious defiance of our Government and its Constitution and laws."

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order on that, on the ground that it is not germane to the bill.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I want to be heard on that.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I take it, Mr. Chairman, that this is the same amendment that the gentleman read?

Mr. BLANTON. No. I have made it conform to the rules, so that it would not be objectionable by a point of order.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. It is manifestly an attempt to ingraft into this bill an entirely new element, namely, the use of other arms of the service. This bill is to authorize a temporary increase of the Coast Guard for law enforcement, and nothing else.

Mr. BEGG. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. BEGG. In addition to what the gentleman is saying, this is a bill to enlarge the Coast Guard, and it is not in order to strike out "the Coast Guard," and substitute "the Navy."

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. It is absolutely not germane to bring in here something about the Army or the Navy or any other arm of the service. The matter involved is the Coast Guard, and anything else is not germane to it.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, if I can first make one observation as to what the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM] has said——

Mr. BLANTON. I yield to the gentleman——

Mr. CRAMTON. Boiled down, the bill is a bill to enlarge the equipment of that branch of the service now organized to prevent smuggling—the Coast Guard. The substitute amendment suggested by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] is a proposition to transfer from the organized Coast Guard its responsibility for the prevention of smuggling—transfer that to the Navy, an entirely different proposition, and not at all germane.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman, may I offer another suggestion before the gentleman from Texas makes his argument?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. BARKLEY. The gentleman from Texas might undertake to hang his amendment on the fact that this bill undertakes to transfer some boats from the Navy to the Coast Guard?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. BARKLEY. I want to anticipate that argument by making this suggestion: It might be in order to transfer other boats from the Navy to the Coast Guard, additional boats than those now provided for in this bill. But that is not what the gentleman's amendment seeks to do. It strikes out all provision with reference to the Coast Guard and inaugurates a new law, invoking the Navy to enforce the prohibition laws. It can not be held germane merely because the first section of the bill transfers 20 boats from the Navy to the Coast Guard. The gentleman's amendment does not propose the transfer of any boats from the Navy to the Coast Guard.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, the question whether or not this amendment is in order depends, of course, upon its germaneness to the purpose of the bill; not to the preamble of the bill; not to any one paragraph of the bill; but the purpose of the bill.

Now, what is the purpose? The purpose of the bill is to enable the President of the United States—the Chief Executive Officer of the Nation, upon whom rests the responsibility of enforcing the law—to enable him to stop the smuggling of liquor into the United States. That is the purpose of the bill. That is the design of the bill. That is what caused this committee to bring this bill before the House for consideration.

Now, the first section of the bill provides this, that the Secretary of the Navy is authorized to transfer boats to the Department of the Treasury. That is one of the Cabinet officers of the Executive; that is one of the underlings of the executive department, if you please; that is a department that is under the control of the Chief Executive Officer of the Nation. Notice it does not say "one of the vessels," or 10, or 20, or 100. It does not limit it except in a certain indirect way. It might, under this bill, take all the vessels that belong to the Navy, because if the chairman will note, it says "such vessels of the Navy, with their outfits and armaments, as can be spared by the Navy and as are adapted for the use of the Coast Guard." That is the only limitation. It might be for the purpose of the suppression of smuggling that all the vessels of the Navy are adapted for its present emergency use, and in that event it would authorize the President to take them all. I merely propose that the President can take all without defining their adaptability.

I want the Chair to note that here is a bill which authorizes the President to use a part of the Navy. If it just provided that he could use one cutter you could not provide that he could use the whole Navy, but inasmuch as it provides that he may use a number of the vessels of the Navy an amendment is germane which provides that he may use the balance of the Navy. Such an amendment is germane under decisions which run back to 1827. If the Chair pleases, there is an unbroken line of decisions back to 1827 which hold that when you provide for the use of a number of things of the same kind you can provide for the use of all the balance of those things. And that is exactly what the amendment means.

Mr. TYDINGS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I am not addressing the gentleman, but the Chair; but I will yield to him.

Mr. TYDINGS. In order to make the amendment germane which the gentleman from Texas has offered, I would suggest, humorously, that these words be added:

And in case of war the Navy be kept on the job of enforcing prohibition and the Army be marched to sea to fight our enemy.

If those words were added, I think, the gentleman's amendment would be in good shape.

Mr. BLANTON. I hope the gentleman will not ever see any more war as long as he and I stay in the House and can vote against it. I think those who came through the last war are going to see to it that we do not have another one at any time within the next 50 years, at least. [Applause.]

But that is beside the question. I want to submit to the Chair, in all seriousness, that this amendment is germane. It is on the same subject; it is akin to it; it pertains to it; it is incidental to it; and it is for the very identical purpose for which this bill is designed—that is, to stop the smuggling of liquor into the United States. I submit to the Chair, in all fairness, that it should not be ruled out on a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. Section 1 of the bill provides:

That the Secretary of the Navy is authorized to transfer to the Department of the Treasury, for the use of the Coast Guard, such vessels of the Navy, with their outfits and armaments, as can be spared by the Navy and as are adapted to the use of the Coast Guard.

The amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas provides:

That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to use and employ the entire naval and military forces of the United States, or so much of any of the above as he may deem necessary, in suppressing all unlawful smuggling into the United States, and in suppressing all rebellious defiance of our Government and its Constitution and laws.

The gentleman from Texas in his argument says the question is the purpose of the bill, and, therefore, that his amendment is germane to the paragraph he seeks to amend. But the Chair does not see that that is the question. The Chair understands the question is not the purpose of the bill but the method to effectuate the purpose. In other words, the purpose of the bill is to enlarge the Coast Guard by transferring some of the vessels of the Navy to the Coast Guard, while the purpose of the gentleman's amendment is to authorize the President of the United States to take from the Navy or the Army such facilities as they may have in order that he may, through that agency, perform the functions which are sought to be performed by the Coast Guard.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the Chair yield and permit me to ask a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. I note that I left in two words, "and military." Those words, of course, would make the amendment subject to the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. I do not think those words would change the status of the amendment.

Mr. BLANTON. But I want to call the Chair's attention to the last three words of the preamble of this bill, which are, "for law enforcement." That is the purpose of the bill, "for law enforcement."

The CHAIRMAN. It is true that is the purpose of the bill, to enforce the law, or, at least, that is one of the purposes of the bill, to enforce the law; but the question before us is not the purpose of the bill. The question is the method as proposed by the gentleman from Texas as it differentiates from the method to enforce the purposes of the bill. That is the way the Chair sees it, and, of course, the Chair can not see how, under the rules of the House, we could substitute as a germane amendment the proposal of the gentleman from Texas for the first section of the bill. So the Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. HILL of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I offer a substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland offers an amendment and is recognized. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Maryland.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HILL of Maryland: On page 1, in line 3, after the words "authorized to," strike out the word "transfer" and insert "lend," and insert after line 7 the following: "With the necessary officers and personnel of the Navy to handle the same for the temporary need."

Mr. HILL of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, it is alleged throughout the hearings on this bill that this is considered a temporary emergency. When asked how long this emergency would continue, Admiral Billard, the head of the Coast Guard, said he did not know.

This bill is preliminary to an appropriation of $13,000,000, which will make the total Coast Guard cost in the coming year $2,000,000 more than the total cost of the Navy in 1890. If this bill is a temporary emergency—and apparently the Federal prohibition commissioner does not consider it necessary—and if this bill is necessary, I suggest that the amendment I offer will keep the various services of the Government in better balance. The section will then read that the Secretary of the Navy is authorized to lend, not transfer, changing the word "transfer" to "lend," to the Department of the Treasury for the use of the Coast Guard, such vessels of the Navy with their outfits and armaments, as can be spared by the Navy and are adapted to the use of the Coast Guard, with such officers and personnel of the Navy as are necessary to handle the same for the temporary emergency.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it can not be contemplated that we should create a new permanent naval force. If we are not attempting to create a new naval force, why all this additional personnel? I call the committee's attention to the hearings on page 10, in which Admiral Billard explains the enormous increase of personnel.

Admiral BILLARD. That does not explain why the captains, and so on. To find out how many officers were needed, and what ranks they should be in, we carefully studied the particular problem, which it will take me only a few minutes to set forth to you.

We have 20 destroyers, for example, to man. We decided to put on those destroyers three line officers and one engineer officer. We made the captain of the destroyer a lieutenant commander, which is a perfectly reasonable rank. We made the captains of five of the destroyers commanders, the idea being that each would have charge of a flotilla of four boats.

We made the chief engineer of five of the destroyers a lieutenant commander, and the others lieutenants.

We have two mine sweepers in this problem. We made their captains lieutenant commanders, the other officers lieutenants.

Mr. SANDERS. You have two mine sweepers?

Admiral BILLARD. I neglected to say that the program involved the transfer of 20 destroyers and 2 mine sweepers.

Mr. SANDERS. Not for mine-sweeping purposes?

Admiral BILLARD. No; just the type of craft.

Mr. SANDERS. I did not know but what the bootleggers were going into it under a large scale.

Admiral BILLARD. No, sir; nothing of that sort.

Mr. NEWTON. Those are from the fleet that was used in the North Sea?

Admiral BILLARD. Yes, sir; large seagoing tugs, and very able vessels.

Then, to run this large number of motor launches, we have to have 24 sections, and we have put a lieutenant in charge of each one of these sections.

We have to have one more division down in the Gulf. We make the officer in charge of that a captain. There is a captain at the head of most of the other divisions.

Then we have four commanders and four lieutenant commanders to act as chiefs of staff in the divisions. There will be eight Coast Guard divisions. There are eight officers there of appropriate rank.

Then we have seven lieutenant commanders of engineering who will be detailed to the divisions to look after the machinery of these motor boats, and so on.

Then, at headquarters here we will need seven additional officers. We have got one captain. His job would be to run this whole armada. He may be called up in the middle of the night on telegrams to run this whole fleet. There might properly be a captain in charge of that work and a commander as his assistant.

There would be one commander in charge of commissioned personnel, whose duty it would be to get these officers and to allocate them.

There would be one commander in charge of enlisted personnel, and one commander in charge of recruiting, which will be a big proposition. Then we have seven officers for recruiting service in the field, to get hold of these men, and we have eight officers for inspection duty.

It all adds up to the number of officers specified in the bill, and we are prepared, I think, to defend each and every one of those officers and the rank given him, that you may be interested to inquire about.

Mr. DENISON. Will you not need an ordnance officer, Admiral?

Admiral BILLARD. We have an ordnance officer at headquarters now.

Gentlemen, you are asked by this bill to begin the authorization and creation of a Navy more expensive than the whole United States Navy we had in 1890.

Mr. HERSEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL of Maryland. In just one moment. If the present needs exist, and Prohibition Commissioner Haynes says they do not exist, and nobody has denied the statements of Prohibition Commissioner Haynes that I read from his book—if the need is only a temporary one, do not create a new personnel, which is only temporary, but let the Navy lend the necessary ships to the Coast Guard. I yield with pleasure to the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. HERSEY. Does the gentleman mean to also lend the men of the Navy to the Coast Guard?

Mr. HILL of Maryland. I mean to lend the ships with their men and officers and everything that belongs to them.

Mr. HERSEY. Then which service would have command, the Coast Guard or the Navy?

Mr. HILL of Maryland. The Coast Guard, naturally. It has an admiral. Why not? I will say to the gentleman that Admiral Billard says in his testimony that it takes three years to create an efficient Coast Guard officer, and he says that if you pass this bill he will have to go out and get ex-service men or anybody else he can find. If this is a necessary need, why do you not use the naval ships you have now?

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL of Maryland. I yield.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. The gentleman asked a question a while ago about Prohibition Commission Haynes. I for one want to say that if Commissioner Haynes made the statement that this service is not needed, he does not know what he is talking about.

Mr. HILL of Maryland. I agree with the gentleman. I am not one of those who entirely relies on Commissioner Haynes, but I hand to the gentleman the book in which he makes the statements, which I read recently to the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Maryland has expired. [Applause.]

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I do not think the amendment offered by the gentleman from Maryland ought to be adopted. If I was sure the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. HILL] was offering this amendment with the idea of helping this law and helping in the enforcement of the law, I might lean a little more strongly toward it, but knowing the gentleman's proclivities the way I do, and knowing his ideas along this line, I might view any amendment he would offer to this bill with some degree of suspicion. But this is not what I arose to say. The trouble in this amendment is well voiced by the suggestion of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HERSEY]. If you transfer certain ships from the Navy to the Coast Guard, who is going to run the ships—the Coast Guard or the Navy? If the naval officers are lent to the Coast Guard, anyone knows who has had any experience with these two departments that it would not be satisfactory to the naval officers to be under the control of Coast Guard officers on this particular duty.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. BUTLER. The gentleman is entirely right. The Coast Guard is no part whatever of the Navy, and you can not mix the officers of the two services without direction of law.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. The gentleman is quite right.

Mr. HILL of Maryland. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. No; not now. If you want the thing to run smoothly, let it all be under one charge. It either must be Coast Guard or Navy. We have started out to improve the Coast Guard; let us do it. Let us turn over the ships to them; put them under the charge of officers trained in that particular line of duty, namely, guarding the coast. It will not do to turn over naval officers and put them in the Coast Guard and say that they are under the control of the Coast Guard.

Mr. SCHAFER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. SCHAFER. In case of another war, who is going to command these ships transferred from the Navy to the Secretary of the Treasury?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Immediately upon war being declared with any country, by law the Coast Guard then goes into the Navy.

Mr. BUTLER. The Coast Guard goes under the Navy then under a long-established law which created the Coast Guard.

Mr. SCHAFER. Then indirectly you are adding more ships to the Navy, not in name, but you are indirectly adding them, because they are ships of war.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. You are adding to a service an auxiliary which may be used by the Navy in time of war, but which in time of peace is for Coast Guard duty entirely and is a distinct service.

Mr. SCHAFER. You are adding war vessels to the Coast Guard.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. You are adding vessels that can be used in time of war.

Mr. SCHAFER. Yes; and I thought it was the understanding after this war that we were not going to have any more wars and the policy was to be to cut down on expenditures for military purposes and not branch out.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I do not believe the gentleman really believed that in his heart.

Mr. O'CONNOR of Louisiana. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. WINSLOW. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in five minutes.

Mr. BLANTON. I have an amendment to offer.

Mr. CELLER. I have an amendment, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend the motion by making it 15 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. It is not a motion but a request.

Mr. CELLER. Reserving the right to object, I shall not object provided I can offer my amendment and have five minutes.

Mr. WINSLOW. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 10 minutes.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend that motion by making the time 15 minutes instead of 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas to the motion offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. HILL of Maryland) there were—ayes 3, noes 50.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WINSLOW].

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I think we ought to have a quorum, and I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers upon that.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] just made the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and seventeen Members present—a quorum.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask for tellers on that vote.

Mr. BEGG. Mr. Chairman, that comes after business has been transacted, and it is too late.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts to limit debate upon this paragraph and all amendments thereto to 10 minutes.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BLANTON) there were—ayes 70, noes 2.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas demands tellers. Those in favor of ordering tellers will rise and stand until counted. [After counting.] Four Members have risen, not a sufficient number, and tellers are refused.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, I would like to make the point that the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. O'CONNOR] addressed the Chair and had the floor and has had it for some time. He merely gave way for this motion to close debate. Can he be taken off the floor?

Mr. O'CONNOR of Louisiana. I say for the benefit of the Chair and the gentleman from South Carolina that I have the floor now; that I never did give way.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas moves that the committee do now rise.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw that motion.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Louisiana is recognized.

Mr. O'CONNOR of Louisiana. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, I am opposed to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. HILL] and I intend to vote for this bill. Inasmuch, however, as I represent a constituency that has been from time immemorial, to use the solemnity of a legal phrase, antiprohibition—that is, a large majority have adopted that attitude—I feel I ought to make the amende honorable to many of them, for they would in all probability expect me to vote against this bill. Though I am convinced that the better viewpoint of the more thoughtful and less impulsive in matters of judgment will unquestionably indorse my affirmative action in the pending bill, I want to get my own judgment into the RECORD for that reason and divers causes, and for the benefit of those who may read the proceedings of this House down in New Orleans express my viewpoint with reference to this matter and things incident and pertinent to it. Yes; I will vote for this bill to authorize a temporary increase of the Coast Guard for law enforcement. Not that I have been altogether impressed by the arguments made that this will make for and effectuate enforcement purposes and therefore it is obligatory upon us to pass it, because I can see that such an attitude has its limitations and might under certain circumstances become illogical and unwise to the point of absurdity, for if it ever becomes necessary, in order to make a pretense at prohibition enforcement, to require an annual appropriation that would run to upward of $2,000,000,000 the American Government would find it necessary to increase taxation to the point of confiscation, and thereby the entire fabric of the Constitution, by trying to vindicate one article, would be involved in the general ruin that would follow such a monstrous expenditure in a fatuous and hopeless attempt to enforce an impossible law. The attempt at enforcement of prohibition might become almost intolerable in the burdens it would impose, and so conclusively show its lack of policy of wisdom and of understanding of human nature as to render it nugatory, when it would fall into "innocuous desuetude." As a matter of fact, it must be clear to him who reads as he runs that there are millions in this country that believe that prohibition is a failure because it is fundamentally unsound, and that our appropriation for its enforcement is nothing more nor less than an extravagant and useless expenditure of public money, and in the minds of many its only result is negative and breeds corruption in prohibition enforcement circles. Of course, it is known of all men that the columns of the great newspapers in all of the big cities daily contain stories showing that if it is not regarded almost as a duty to infract the Volstead Act, it certainly with truth may be said to be fashionable, smart, and risque. I do not think that the general violation of this act is any longer disputed. During this debate it apparently surprised no one to hear two of the most distinguished advocates of prohibition in this country—one on the Democratic side and one on the Republican side—practically make statements which, if their statistics are correct, would indicate that more whisky is being drunk in the United States to-day than was drunk before prohibition. In fact, if they did not prove that, they came perilously and dangerously near doing so. I understand that at a convention of the American Federation of Labor, held, I believe, in Portland, Oreg., last year or the year before, it was put into the proceedings that there were more whisky glasses being manufactured, or blown, if that is the term, to-day than ever before in the history of the country. While I may not put this into the RECORD because I only give it for the temporary purpose that it will serve, and I know that people are not interested in my personal habits, I am not a drinking man myself, but I represent a constituency the majority of whom, as I said before, look upon prohibition as ill advised and doomed to failure, and necessarily they look upon the expenditure of any money for the enforcement of it as money absolutely thrown away.

They can not see any wisdom in it, but, on the contrary, view it as unmitigated folly, and although their unalterable opposition to what they deem to be an unwarrantable invasion of their liberty may appear to be fantastic and absurd to some of our citizens who somewhat superciliously arrogate to themselves all of the virtues and patriotism in this country, still those people are sincere in their attitude of deep-seated hostility and antagonism to what they bitterly resent as oppression from a tyrannical minority organized in such a manner as to make for the congressional imposition of their views on the unorganized and helpless masses. And these constituents of mine are patriotic and wise in their ways. They are an educated people and have inherited and evidenced a splendid culture. They are not easily misled by sophistry. They can not understand why we should believe there is so much merit in prohibition when they thoroughly comprehend that the world long before prohibition had come to us gave to posterity the greatest poets, the greatest astronomers, the greatest industrialists, the greatest inventors and writers, under a system that made for more or less drinking, while the nondrinking countries of the Orient were steeped in ignorance, venality, and corruption, and had made absolutely no progress.

I will vote for this bill as I want to give enforcement every opportunity to succeed and make good. But I have no faith in prohibition fundamentally. Regulation would produce infinitely better results. One thing is certain and fixed as the stars in their courses. Prohibition must show better results or the conclusion will be irresistible that it is a failure. That sort of failure would not be an unmixed evil even. On the contrary it would prove a blessing. Then the American people would approach the liquor question and traffic in a tolerant and wiser way, and secure through a regulatory process far greater and more lasting and beneficent results than the present system under the most favorable conditions and circumstances can yield. I speak more in sorrow than in anger at the bacchanalian orgies of drunkenness in all of our towns resulting from "white lightning," conveniently carried in stylish flasks in big pockets; of the graft stories in our newspapers, of the sinister and menacing corruption existing in that part of the official life charged with enforcement. Of course there are—there must be—many honest, virtuous men connected with that service, but the people are undoubtedly correct in assuming that there are many vulnerable spots, and you know it is human for the most benevolent to judge the whole by a part of the system.

Only a few days ago Police Commissioner Enright, of New York, made a statement of such a startling nature that the Associated Press and other great news agencies carried it from ocean to ocean—as we love to express the vastness, the magnitude of our territorial empire, as it extends from east to west, from the rising to the setting sun. The commissioner declared, as I remember it, that every phase of society in the United States refused to respect and observe the Volstead Act and infracted it with the same savoir faire, serenity, composure, and tranquillity that they would a statute that expressed a totally fallacious economic principle, a physical impossibility, or a physiological absurdity or other parliamentary and governmental aberration. And right here in Washington, Capital of the Nation, denominated by Admiral Plunkett, according to press accounts, as "the wettest city in the Union," we find a number of persons who deny the soft impeachment and insist that there are a number of cities that are wetter. I heard some one say that if the dissenters are correct the other cities must be inundated, and that it is time to order the arks. But I will close lest some honest, sincere prohibitionist friend of mine rise in his seat, gently chide me, and try to prove that all of the great men who adorned and glorified the civilizations of ancient Greece and the magnificent Roman Empire, the heroes and geniuses of the Middle Ages, and the mighty men of the modern world were mythological characters, were never existent because it was impossible for talent, culture, ambition, virtue, or patriotism to exist until the day of long-haired men and short-haired women arrived, who constructed by statute a prohibition fountain, whose miraculous waters made for a realization in the coming years of what was only a dream on our part of historically renowned men and women of the past.

That there were great men before Agamemnon is a historical idiocy. There were none such. There were great men after prohibitionists—at any rate so saith the "prohi." With that, selah—for that is all I can do or say—knowing from the constitution of this House and the numerical strength of the "prohis" and the corresponding weakness of the "antis" that we "antis" can not make a dent in the Volstead Act at this session of Congress.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I do not know that I can say anything that will add to what has already been said as to why this bill should pass. I was very much interested in the remarks of the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. O'CONNOR] when he stated that a great many people in this country could see no good reason why prohibition should be enforced. I want to say to the gentleman from Louisiana that I am one of those who believe that the eighteenth amendment is just as sacred as any other part of the Constitution.

Mr. O'CONNOR of Louisiana. Oh, I think the gentleman totally misapprehended the point involved. I was simply expressing the viewpoint of a constituency that I represent, and I did not intend to question the gentleman's sincerity at all.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. I may have been mistaken in what the gentleman stated, but I say again that the eighteenth amendment is just as sacred as any other part of the Constitution, and that a man who violates it is just as guilty as he would be if he committed any other crime against the Constitution. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS] referred to the attitude of the people in Maryland in opposition to the eighteenth amendment. He knows that the legislature of his State ratified the eighteenth amendment to our Constitution. Now, Mr. Chairman, the question that we are considering to-day is not whether or not the law can be enforced, but whether or not our Government is going to try to enforce the law of our land. There is no law on our statute books to-day that is enforced 100 per cent, and surely you men would not oppose an appropriation to stop the violation of the other laws of our country outside of the eighteenth amendment to our Constitution. The President of the United States has come to Congress and asked us to give him the power and the money and the men to try to enforce the constituted law of our land. The statement was made in the hearings held recently by the Committee on Appropriations that the rum runners which line our Atlantic coast line to-day are the boldest band of pirates that has ever operated upon the high seas.

We are told that within the last four or five months 56 vessels have joined the rum-running fleet, and reports have come to us that during the last six months 1,226,000 cases of rum have been landed on our shores. I believe the time has come when the open and armed opposition to our country and its laws by foreign ships should be stopped. The foreign ships which carry the liquor are very careful not to get in closer than the 3-mile limit. Now, what this bill proposes to do is to try and prevent the rum runners that go out from our shores to the ships from carrying the contraband liquor into our ports. Commander Root, testifying before the Appropriations Committee on this question a few days ago, said:

> In considering this matter, the prohibition feature on liquor question should be eliminated from the mind. Were the traffic confined to diamonds, for example, its bad effect would be the same.

Nonenforcement of the law is bringing the National Government and the very Constitution itself into contempt, and, what is almost equally bad, is causing an ever-increasing flow of money into the coffers of the underworld. This money is being used to finance all sorts of criminal ventures, and is, I believe, one of the prime causes of the increase of crime.

The people of our Nation are demanding that the importation of intoxicating liquors into our country in violation of our laws be stopped. The President has requested Congress to assist him in upholding the law. Surely no Member who wants to see our laws enforced should oppose the passage of the bill which is now being considered. We prohibit the sale and manufacture of intoxicating liquors in our own land. Why should we permit foreign countries to import liquor which is prohibited under our Constitution?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. HILL].

The question was taken, and the Chair announced the noes appeared to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. HILL of Maryland) there were—ayes 4, noes 62.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CELLER: Page 1, line 7, after the words "Coast Guard," insert "provided such vessels with their outfits and armaments be returned to the Navy after a period of one year."

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I for debate?

The CHAIRMAN. Five minutes.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Debate is exhausted on this paragraph and all amendments thereto.

The CHAIRMAN. That is true. The Chair wishes to announce that debate is exhausted on this amendment by a vote of the committee.

Mr. CELLER. I ask unanimous consent for two minutes in order to explain my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BLANTON. I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BLANTON: Page 1, line 3, after the words "authorized to," strike out the words "transfer to" and insert the words "cooperate with"; and in line 4, after the word "Treasury," strike out the words "for the" and insert the words "by combining with the vessels in"; and in line 5, after the word "with," insert the words "their officers and personnel"; and in line 7, after the words "Coast Guard," strike out the period, insert a comma, and add "to suppress smuggling into the United States," so that as amended the paragraph will read:

That the Secretary of the Navy is authorized to cooperate with the Department of the Treasury, by combining with the vessels in use of the Coast Guard, such vessels of the Navy, with their officers and personnel, their outfits, and armaments, as can be spared by the Navy and as are adapted to the use of the Coast Guard, to suppress smuggling into the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced the noes appeared to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. BLANTON) there were—ayes 5, noes 65.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, would a new paragraph at this point be subject to the same ruling as an amendment to the paragraph?

The CHAIRMAN. It depends upon what the amendment is.

Mr. WATKINS. I desire to insert a new paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair could not tell. Does the gentleman offer an amendment?

Mr. WATKINS. As a new paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WATKINS: Page 1, line 7, after the word "Guard," add a new section as follows:

"SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and hereby is, authorized and directed to assign one Coast Guard cutter, if available, and if not available, then to construct and equip one Coast Guard cutter, at a cost not to exceed $900,000, for Coast Guard duty on the Pacific coast: Provided, That such vessel shall be so constructed as to be best adapted for the purpose of saving life and property at sea and for law enforcement."

Mr. WATKINS. I offer that as section 2.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

Mr. WATKINS. This is a new paragraph; it is not an amendment at all. If I am not permitted to offer it here I will offer it later on, but I want to dispose of it now, and I would like to explain my reasons for it. I am as much for this bill as any man in this House.

The CHAIRMAN. If it is offered as an amendment it is not debatable.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. It is subject to the point of order.

Mr. BEGG. I make a point of order it is too late.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WINSLOW] was on his feet.

Mr. WINSLOW. I make the point of order that the subject matter is not germane to this bill. It is meritorious, no doubt, but not germane. It is for another purpose altogether.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the gentleman's point of order comes too late, there having been debate. The RECORD will show that there was quite a colloquy between the gentleman and the Chair in reference to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. That is not a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. WATKINS. I would like to be heard for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts wish to be heard on the point of order? The Chair will be glad to hear the gentleman.

Mr. WINSLOW. The subject matter is not germane to the purpose of the bill. It embraces another line of work for the Coast Guard and is not in any way bearing on the law-enforcement phase of the bill.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, let me add another suggestion that it has this fundamental objection, and that is it directs a certain vessel to be built and placed in certain waters of the country to perform a certain duty. If that is germane, it is also germane for other gentlemen from other localities to offer additional amendments for boats to be placed, say, in Florida or in Texas waters, or a boat to be placed anywhere else. The bill provides that the Coast Guard Service shall be on all the high seas, without saying what shall be done or where placed. It is certainly not germane to the purpose of this bill at all to embody a provision that specifies what shall be done with those that are sent into particular waters of the country; this is especially true when we consider that this bill provides only for a temporary increase of the Coast Guard, while the amendment provides for a certain permanent increase for purposes not intended or covered by the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman wish to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. WATKINS. I do. The observation submitted at this time by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM] may be valid in so far as being an administrative feature, for it might not be appropriate for a bill of this kind to direct the Secretary of the Treasury to do a certain thing; but in so far as the section being germane is concerned, the mere reading of it will convince the Chair that it is germane. The section simply provides that if there is a cutter available the Secretary is directed to assign that particular cutter to a particular place. If there is no available cutter, then the section simply provides that a new one is authorized for the purpose of law enforcement, and to be placed in the Pacific coast waters and there protect property and life—the thing that the Coast Guard does now—and in addition to that to aid in the enforcement of the law. I maintain that if there is anything in the wide universe that is germane, it is that language to this bill.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, I simply make this suggestion, that the pending bill is well described by its title, "to authorize a temporary increase of the Coast Guard." That temporary increase is by a loan of vessels from the Navy. The gentleman's amendment proposes a permanent increase in the Coast Guard in the construction of a new vessel. It is not germane to the program carried forward in the pending bill.

Mr. BEGG. Mr. Chairman, I merely want to direct the attention of the Chair to section 781 of the manual, where it seems to me there is a specific illustration. In the case of the bill relating to commerce between the States it has been held that it is not germane to specify a particular State.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. The purpose of the bill is to authorize the transfer of ships from the Navy to the Coast Guard. The amendment of the gentleman from Oregon provides for the construction of a ship or ships to be used in the Coast Guard.

Mr. WATKINS. That is the second clause.

The CHAIRMAN. But it is in the amendment. Nowhere in the bill is there any provision for the construction of ships for the Coast Guard. It is manifest that the amendment of the gentleman from Oregon is not germane to the bill, and therefore it is subject to a point of order. The Chair sustains the point of order. The Clerk will read.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLANTON. In a couple of weeks the chairman will be called upon to make appropriations under this bill. What is the chairman going to do when points of order are raised that there is no law authorizing it?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, that is not a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. I think the gentleman has not exactly stated the case.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment as a new section.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment as a new section. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CELLER: Page 1, line 7, after the word "law," insert a new section as follows: "Provided, All acts or parts of acts contrary to or inconsistent with this act shall be deemed repealed."

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that that is not germane to the section.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment offered by the gentleman would be appropriate to the bill, but the Chair doubts if it would be appropriate at this point.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I make the further point of order that the amendment is not germane to the bill or to the section preceding the place where it is offered, for the reason that the purposes of this bill apparently are to enforce the prohibition laws and to prevent smuggling. But the amendment of the gentleman would do just the contrary.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Chairman, will the Chair hear me on the point of order?

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. (a) The President is authorized to appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, the following temporary officers of the Coast Guard: 2 captains, 13 commanders, 25 lieutenant commanders, 48 lieutenants, and 42 lieutenants (junior grade) and ensigns, of the line; and 1 commander, 11 lieutenant commanders, 19 lieutenants, and 40 lieutenants (junior grade) and ensigns, of the Engineer Corps.

(b) Such temporary officers shall receive the same pay, allowances, and benefits as permanent commissioned officers of the Coast Guard of corresponding grade and length of service, except that no such officer shall be entitled to retirement because of his temporary commission.

(c) Temporary appointments shall continue until the President otherwise directs or Congress otherwise provides.

Mr. HILL of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

Mr. WINSLOW. Mr. Chairman, I wish to offer an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the committee amendment to this section.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: Page 2, line 7, after the word "officers," insert "while in service."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WINSLOW].

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WINSLOW: Page 2, line 1, strike out "thirteen" and insert "ten." Line 3, strike out "one commander" and insert "five commanders."

Mr. WINSLOW. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this amendment is to better balance the officers designated in the Coast Guard. In going over the matter after we reported out the bill they discovered that the reapportionment would be helpful and would not increase the cost a dollar, although it increases the number of officers by one. But by reapportionment the salaries are so arranged that it does not increase the cost.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

Mr. HILL of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which the Clerk has.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Maryland.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HILL of Maryland: Page 1, line 9, after the word "Senate," insert "for a period of not more than two years."

Mr. HILL of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, the alleged and obvious purpose of this bill is temporary. All through the hearings the statement was made that this was a temporary need. If this is so, why not use the Navy? Read what was said in committee on this:

WHY NOT USE THE NAVY?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I would like to ask one question. I do not know whether the admiral wants to answer it or not: Have you considered turning this duty over to the Navy from your department?

Admiral BILLARD. Well, I can only speak of what I have read in the press, and I have seen one or two bills introduced in Congress.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Do you know that it has been considered—this proposition?

Admiral BILLARD. I have no official knowledge, only what I have read in the press.

The CHAIRMAN. I think there has been no comprehensive plan suggested, Mr. SHALLENBERGER. The whole administration, all down the line, have concentrated on this arrangement.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Of course, Mr. Chairman, the reason I asked the question is because it may be said that the Navy has the equipment; they have the destroyers; they have these motor launches; they have the men who are qualified for this duty if they saw fit to ask them to perform it.

The CHAIRMAN. As the chairman stated in the beginning—I would like to be confirmed by Admiral Billard—the Navy has acquiesced in this procedure?

Admiral BILLARD. Oh, yes; and we have received the most helpful cooperation from the Navy with respect to information, and so on.

The CHAIRMAN. All the information that the chairman has been able to pick up indicates that they would be very glad to get rid of it.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I would judge that the Navy probably would rather that this department take charge of it.

Admiral BILLARD. You saw, of course, the opinion of the Attorney General, which I read in the press, to the effect that the President could not use the Navy for that work.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I did not see that. I am glad to have you inform me of that.

You can at any moment place the Navy at the disposition of the President, and save here $14,000,000 at once.

But there is no real need. Read what Admiral Billard says:

Mr. COOPER. Admiral, have any of your men been fired on by the rum runners?

Admiral BILLARD. There have been cases, as I recall now, where some of our men in launches have been fired on by these rum runners whom they are pursuing.

Mr. COOPER. Have any of them been wounded or killed?

Admiral BILLARD. No; none of our men have been killed, and I do not recall any of them ever being wounded.

Billard says nobody has been even wounded, and Haynes says smuggling is only a "leak" of slight importance.

It is proposed to expend this year over $22,000,000 for the Coast Guard; and I submit to this House that it is only proper that when these officers are appointed—this large personnel—that there should be a limit to the period of their appointment. The period of need is uncertain. Read what the admiral says:

Admiral BILLARD. * * * In other words, that the whole project would be temporary and addressed particularly to the law-enforcement matter.

Mr. NEWTON. These destroyers—is it going to be much of an expense to condition them for this service? Of course, you will not use the same armament?

Admiral BILLARD. We have gone into that very thoroughly. We would prefer to keep the armament on board, the full armament, probably, because our officers and men would exercise with it naturally. The cost estimated for putting these destroyers into service—not particularly for this service, but for service—is $100,000 apiece. Those figures, of course, we obtained from the Navy Department.

Mr. NEWTON. Of course, we have dozens of destroyers that are tied up at the docks, not in commission at all.

Admiral BILLARD. Yes, sir.

Mr. MERRITT. When you speak of this service being temporary, I suppose you mean that it depends on what may happen in the future, that it may be terminated at any time, or do you expect to wipe out all of the rum fleet in a course of a year or two?

Admiral BILLARD. That is something that any of you gentlemen know just as well as I do, Mr. Merritt. How long this operation will have to continue, I have no idea.

Nobody knows how long this all will last, and furthermore the nearly $14,000,000 you are asked to spend does not cover even all of the Canadian border. It does not touch the Mexican border, and leaves open the St. Marys and the Detroit Rivers. Read the hearings:

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I would like to ask, how is smuggling prevented from Canada across, we will say, the Detroit River and the St. Lawrence?

Admiral BILLARD. Well, I rather think it is not prevented to any great extent.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Have we a system of organized customs guards?

Admiral BILLARD. Well, there are customs officials, I presume, along all that stretch of boundary, and they do the best they can, and doubtless prevent a great deal of smuggling. About what I said a moment ago, somewhat in a spirit of levity, of course we all know there is a good deal of liquor comes across the boundary.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I should imagine that the Lake region would need to be guarded the same as the coast region.

Admiral BILLARD. You may have misunderstood what I said, sir. I said that this plan does include the protection of the Lakes, but not of the St. Marys and Detroit Rivers. Personally, I feel that that is a duty for the land people, because the river is too narrow to accomplish anything or much by boats running up and down.

I know the committee appreciates that the way the Coast Guard links up with this thing is that one of its duties is to protect the customs laws of the United States, and this particular thing happens to be forbidden to be imported by act of Congress.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. That is why I used the word "smuggling," because smuggling must be quite an industry if there are no guards along the Canadian border.

Gentlemen, the Coast Guard asked for more than this bill gives them and the Budget cut them down. Note the following statements:

Mr. NEWTON. Admiral, may I interrupt you there? I believe, if my memory serves me correctly, that in the request originally it was for the construction and lease of some new vessels designed specially for work of this kind. Now, that part of the request was turned down, was it not, by the Director of the Budget?

Admiral BILLARD. That situation, Mr. NEWTON, is this: We, when directed, as I have stated, to prepare a general plan, suggested the construction of 20 cruising Coast Guard cutters for the offshore work. Our thought was that those vessels would be available, not only for this law enforcement but would be a valuable acquisition to the service and to the Government for the regular work of the service. The Bureau of the Budget were of the opinion that what was preeminently desired in the matter was prompt and effective results; also that the scheme should be a temporary measure, not concerned with the future growth or general utility of the Coast Guard, but for this specific work.

At the direction of the Bureau of the Budget we considered, then, what vessels the Government now has that would be of service for this particular law-enforcement work and that could be quickly put into service. The result of that discussion was the adoption of this program to utilize destroyers of the Navy.

Mr. NEWTON. Are any other ships besides destroyers included?

Admiral BILLARD. The program involves, furthermore, the utilization of a large number of motor launches. That was in our original program and was approved by the Bureau of the Budget. In other words, the only departure from the original plan as submitted was with respect to these offshore larger units.

If there is a temporary need use the Navy. If you refuse to do that, limit the period of all this huge and extra expenditure. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Maryland.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. WINSLOW. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto do close in five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SPEAKS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The gentleman from Ohio offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SPEAKS: Strike out lines 8, 9, and 10 on page 1, and lines 1 to 12, inclusive, on page 2, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"SEC. 2. The President is authorized to temporarily assign the following officers of the Navy to Coast Guard duty."

Mr. SPEAKS. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I have a very sincere purpose in proposing this amendment, which if adopted will insure certain enforcement of the law. I am for the law and believe it can be made effective. This amendment proposes transferring temporarily or assigning temporarily from the regular naval forces to Coast Guard duty the officers specified in the bill.

An emergency exists, and I want the country to note what our splendid Naval Establishment can accomplish in the way of law enforcement where it becomes necessary to rely upon that governmental agency in compelling respect for our laws and integrity.

Mr. BARKLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SPEAKS. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. BARKLEY. Does the gentleman know whether the Navy has any officers hanging around doing nothing that it can transfer to Coast Guard duty?

Mr. SPEAKS. In an emergency, such as now exists, it certainly will be possible to find sufficient officers to perform this highly important service without in anywise disturbing the naval routine. Even if it requires detailing officers from some of the vessels lying quietly in harbors or engaged in practice cruising. I believe the emergency warrants such action. Furthermore, it will prevent an unnecessary increase in the Coast Guard personnel and the expenditure of several hundred thousands of dollars annually.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4. (a) All original temporary appointments under this act shall be made in grades not above that of lieutenant, in the line or the Engineer Corps, and shall be made only after the candidate has satisfactorily passed such examinations as the President may prescribe. No person shall be given an original temporary appointment who is more than 40 years of age.

(b) The names of all persons appointed under this section shall be placed upon a special list of temporary officers, as distinguished from the list of permanent officers, of the Coast Guard. The President is authorized, without regard to length of service or seniority, to promote to grades not above lieutenant, in the line or Engineer Corps, or to reduce officers on such special list, within the number specified for each grade, and he may, in his discretion, call for the resignation of, or dismiss, any such officer for unfitness or misconduct.

Mr. WINSLOW. Mr. Chairman, on behalf of the committee I offer an amendment, which I will ask the Clerk to read.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WINSLOW: Page 3, after line 3, insert the following new subdivision:

"(b) Any warrant officer or enlisted man of the permanent Coast Guard may be given an original temporary appointment under this act, under such regulations as the President may prescribe, and without reduction in pay or allowances. Notwithstanding such temporary appointment any such warrant officer or enlisted man shall be entitled to retirement in the same manner as though he had continued to hold his permanent grade or rating, and upon the termination of such temporary appointment shall be entitled to revert to such grade or rating. Service under any such temporary appointment shall be included in determining length of service as a warrant officer or enlisted man."

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the amendment is not germane either to the purposes of the bill or to the paragraph to which it is offered.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Texas desire to cite any authorities?

Mr. BLANTON. I call the Chair's attention to the wording of the bill and to that paragraph. This is merely for the benefit of certain officers in the Coast Guard and has no relevancy whatever to the purposes of this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. WINSLOW. I think it is so apparently wrong that I will not make any remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. It looks to the Chair as though there were no question about the germaneness of this amendment. It deals with the subject and authorizes the President of the United States to do certain things in connection with the enforcement of this act, if it becomes an act. Among the things he is authorized to do is to appoint officers, and this amendment deals with the appointment of officers and indicates the source from which these officers shall come. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. WINSLOW. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, when the bill was under discussion before the committee there was doubt as to whether or not full justice would be done under the original provisions to those warrant officers who are now with the Coast Guard in the event of their being promoted for temporary service under the provisions of this bill. The committee came to the conclusion it would be all right and we passed the original bill, but afterwards a more careful study was made, and in order to protect the interests of those who might be advanced, so that they would not lose by virtue of receiving less salary or lose their status from the standpoint of length of service, but would have the full strength of their position when they might be returned to the regular service, this change was made.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word of the amendment for the purpose of asking the gentleman a question or two. Was the advisability of taking into this service some of the reserve force of the Navy considered by the gentleman's committee?

Mr. WINSLOW. I will say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that the subject was discussed in the committee and privately. The same trouble seemed to exist there that existed in respect of every other one of these efforts to bring the Navy within the scope of this bill. Quite likely they might be brought in and quite likely the Navy might under some conditions be used, but that would necessitate the untangling of a mass of detail and a lot of laws as well as the creation of new laws, which would simply hold back this effort.

The point is this: If we are to push this thing through now and give the department the benefit of this development of the Coast Guard, we will have to do it without taking in the Navy; but if later it is wise to take in Naval Reserve officers we can do it at the proper time.

Mr. BUTLER. Some of the most valuable men ever employed in the military forces are to be found in the Naval Reserve.

Mr. WINSLOW. There is not a doubt about that. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. BUTLER. Certainly a man has some privilege here. These gentlemen do not quite understand what they are doing, I may suggest. [Applause.] There is a complication here. I understand it is the purpose to employ some of these reserves, and I want to know what is to become of their pay in their grades. They get but small salaries. Are they to have two pays? They get now what is called retainer pay. Under the act of 1916 many of these men have left the active service after 16 years of service or 20 years of service and get what is known as retainer pay. My purpose is to help you with the bill. If you want to pay men two salaries, all right. They may wish to employ some of these reserves, and if they do, in my judgment, they should have but one pay, and I had an amendment which I proposed to offer, but I do not want to complicate the gentleman's bill. The gentleman and myself are in perfect accord.

Mr. WINSLOW. Quite.

Mr. BUTLER. But I would like to assist, if I could, by suggesting that in the event these reserves are called into the temporary service of the Coast Guard they might be employed, and when this temporary need for their service is at an end they should have the opportunity of returning to the grades they left. For three or four years I have tried to help some of the enlisted men of the Navy get back from temporary service to their grades, and I have not yet succeeded, and I do not want to see a mistake made here.

Mr. WINSLOW. As I understand it, that is provided for.

Mr. BUTLER. No; the amendment of the gentleman does not provide for that. Your bill provides for a temporary force built from the inside of the Coast Guard, this splendid service which your committee has charge of. It does not reach those now outside. I can not see how the Government is to obtain the enlisted force which it may be necessary to have or how we shall increase it. However, I am perfectly willing to vote for the gentleman's bill as it is. It may be corrected, perhaps, later if we find it necessary to do so.

Mr. WINSLOW. The committee is entitled to have an explanation of that. My conception is that under this bill the Coast Guard can promote officers within and enlisted men, and can reach out and get others wherever they choose.

Mr. BUTLER. Officers; yes.

Mr. WINSLOW. Anybody.

Mr. BUTLER. The gentleman understands the general law, the organic law and the additions made to it, which provided for the Coast Guard, and the gentleman will know whether or not under the general law they are authorized to increase the enlisted force of the Coast Guard.

Mr. WINSLOW. They are authorized to do that under this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BUTLER. I ask for an additional minute.

Mr. SNYDER. Ask for five minutes.

Mr. BUTLER. No. Gentlemen are extremely anxious to vote on this bill, and I am not here for the purpose of blocking it in any way. I want to assist the gentlemen in increasing the Coast Guard. I have never known any part of the military service or of the civil service that attracted more favorable attention of everybody than the Coast Guard. There never was a better set of men employed in the service of any country in any pursuit, and I want to see the bill made exactly right if I can; but I am ready to vote for the improvement of the Coast Guard, and I almost hesitate to make a suggestion.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. It does not seem to me that in a matter as important as this, that gentlemen who desire to talk on it for a moment or two, ought to be carried off their feet.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, I want to correct my statement. My attention has been called to the fact that the bill does provide for the situation I had in mind.

Mr. SNYDER. I want the gentlemen of this House to know that I favor this legislation. I believe in the enforcement of the law and I am for this bill because I want to give the President an opportunity to endeavor to enforce the law; but I have a great deal of sympathy with the men who think that the officers at least, for these ships, should be taken from the personnel of the Navy. These ships now belong to the Navy. Whom could we find better qualified to operate them than the men who have operated them in the past, and why should not the reserve officers of the Navy be used to man them?

Mr. WINSLOW. If the gentleman will yield, for the purpose of information, which I am sure the gentleman wants the committee to have——

Mr. SNYDER. I am trying to get a little information myself. I have not yet heard where you are going to get these officers or the enlisted men.

Mr. WINSLOW. The Navy Department and the Coast Guard have worked out this bill and have approved it. The ships are to come from tie-ups at the docks in the East River and down in the James River where they are now gathered like rats around a vault.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, I do not yield further in my time.

Mr. WINSLOW. And they are not manned and they have no officers. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. SNYDER. Gentlemen will not take me off my feet by calling for a vote. I do not take much of the time of this House.

The gentleman says that these ships are tied up. That is probably true, but we want to get action upon this matter, because it is called a "temporary matter," and there is no question about the necessity for action, and if you have to appoint new officers and get new men it is going to take months to put these ships in operation, whereas if you use the men from the Navy or from the reserve force of the Navy you can man these ships and have them in operation inside of a month.

Mr. BARKLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNYDER. Yes.

Mr. BARKLEY. It is the purpose of the Coast Guard to get these officers wherever they can. They do not intend to wait until they have trained a new set of officers, but there are men who have heretofore been in the service who may be qualified, and there is nothing in this bill to prevent them from being employed.

Mr. SNYDER. Does the gentleman mean to say that we are carrying enough idle men or enough reserve men in the Coast Guard to man these ships?

Mr. BARKLEY. No; I do not mean to say that, but I mean to say that the Coast Guard may utilize such men as they may find who heretofore have served in the Navy or they may find them elsewhere.

Mr. SNYDER. There is no doubt but that there would be some conflict of authority in taking men from the Navy and putting them aboard these ships, but that is a matter of detail which could be easily worked out, and if you gentlemen who are so anxious to enforce this law want to get enforcement quickly you should change this bill and take your men from the Navy, and you can put them in action within a week.

Mr. BARKLEY. There is no limitation upon the Coast Guard as to where they will get the men to man these ships.

Mr. SNYDER. I agree with that, but there would be no delay and no additional expense to the Government if you took these men from the Navy or the reserve force.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired. The question is on the committee amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 5. (a) Under such regulations as he may prescribe the President is authorized to appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, 25 temporary chief warrant officers of the Coast Guard from the permanent list of warrant officers of the Coast Guard.

(b) Such chief warrant officers shall receive the same pay, allowances, and benefits as commissioned warrant officers of the Navy, except that any such officer shall continue to hold his permanent grade and shall be retired in the same manner as though this act had not become law.

Mr. UPSHAW. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I am supporting this bill because I believe it is a step in the right direction. Very frankly, I think the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON], who opposes the bill, is opposing it—much to our regret and contrary to what we count his prohibition consistency—on the ground that it does not go far enough. I am for this bill and "then some," and the time may come very soon when I shall be in favor of a greater step.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UPSHAW. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. Why did not the gentleman support my proposition, which was a real prohibition proposition?

Mr. UPSHAW. Because I did not wish to defeat this bill, which is emergency legislation. The plan proposed by the gentleman from Texas is so sweeping that it needs to be well considered in committee, with all details perfected. One of the bravest things ever said in Washington was uttered not so long ago by Governor Neff, of Texas, when, speaking largely for the very things that Mr. BLANTON has proposed in his resolution, lifting his fearless voice for the majesty of the law and for the threatened ideals of America before our own eyes and the eyes of the world, he said that if he had his way and a foreign vessel came upon these shores to "dispute our laws, pull down our American flag, and trample our sober Constitution, the owners of the outlaw vessel would have to look for their ship at the bottom of the sea." This bill proposes seashore relief and efficiency now, and for that reason I am in favor of all that we can get without delay.

Another thing that I want to emphasize is the fact that it is a step in the right direction in smashing a certain immunity for those in high position—a kind of gilded political liquor immunity.

We have been allowing it to men with power until our prohibition department is shot through and through with politics, not because Commissioner Haynes is not "dry" and honest but because the law allows Members of the House and the Senate to go down there and help to have "wet" men appointed to enforce "dry" laws. For that reason I am in favor of the Cramton bill that will put all enforcement officers under civil service.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. The gentleman realizes that it is not the foreign vessels that deliver the whisky to our shores. They are American boats, small craft, and that is what we want to stop.

Mr. UPSHAW. Yes, and that is the reason I am in favor of this bill. It will help to catch and destroy the defiant small craft now smuggling liquid damnation which the big naval vessels could not immediately reach. May I say this other word, pertinent to this very bill? I am turning over to that committee in the Senate which proposes to investigate the affairs of the Department of Justice some evidence that is positively shocking to this country. For instance, a millionaire named Remus, who was recently sentenced for bootlegging in Cincinnati, according to press reports, was permitted to ride to Atlanta to the Federal penitentiary in his private car. He is now receiving special attention with another millionaire bootlegger as his valet, if you please, in the Atlanta Federal penitentiary, and everybody knows that such favoritism is not being granted by the prison authorities down there, but somebody higher up is allowing that kind of devilment. The poor devil down yonder who violates the law concerning a gallon or a jug of illicit liquor is forced to suffer all of the humiliation possible, while the gilded millionaire who has grown rich out of the defiance of our laws and the blood of our American boys and girls is not even required to go to the big table and eat with the other criminals, but up in the room of the priest of that Federal penitentiary he is permitted to have special meals brought to him. I have in my pocket incontestible evidence of this millionaire's favoritism. Nobody blames the rich bootlegger for desiring and securing an easy time, but it is an outrage, and I shall ask the Senate committee, already in action, to extend its investigation to this glaring abuse by the Department of Justice.

Listen to a few lines from this startling letter, not from a prisoner but from a reputable citizen who knows the facts:

While Senator GREENE is near death, this institution is entertaining the "king of bootleggers." I can only hint at the real facts, but I can give you enough to convince you that a congressional investigation should be instigated at once. This king of bootleggers is too good to eat with the other prisoners and too good to sleep like them. He has privileges that the other prisoners do not have, and they are getting sore over it. * * * Other irregularities also need investigation.

This, gentlemen, gives an insight into the favoritism which the Department of Justice allows, for, as I have said, nobody believes that the authorities at the Federal prison would take such responsibility upon themselves. Let it be remembered that it is not a disposition to be unkind personally to this favored prisoner that causes me to publish this revelation, which, with other evidence, I will turn over to the Senate committee, but it is the basic purpose to see that, in prison as well as outside, there should be "equal rights to all and special privileges to none."

ANOTHER GREAT INJUSTICE.

And while this investigation is going on I hope they will go back a few months before the present head officials came to the Atlanta Federal prison and dig up the facts concerning an evident frame-up to destroy four of the most efficient and trustworthy employees in the prison. Through the testimony chiefly of dope fiends with bad records four men of long, faithful service were arrested and without any protest on their part to make handcuffs necessary they were handcuffed and carried through the streets in this humiliating fashion, a $5,000 bond demanded, and two or three of them thrown in jail because of their immediate inability to furnish such an exorbitant bond. To make short a long and outrageous story, these men were finally given their liberty and reinstated there or elsewhere in Government positions. If they were guilty, they should not have been returned to work, and if they were innocent the Government certainly ought to pay them for their lost time. That would be as little as any just government could do. Senator WILLIAM J. HARRIS and I have introduced companion bills to pay what is due these worthy men, but the inspectors and officials who caused their suffering ought to be brought to justice.

Let justice be done, though the heavens tumble down.

Mr. TAGUE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I rise for the purpose of asking the Chairman if the amendment which I suggested to him could not be offered at this place? I want to bring to the attention of the committee something I believe the Chairman will accept. The members of the Coast Guard who have been serving in the Coast Guard for many years on account of the law of February, 1922, were deprived of the benefit of the pension laws of the Nation. When the war came on all of the members of the Coast Guard went into the naval service, and in going into the naval service at that time they were given the benefit of the pension laws which were given to the members of the Army and the Navy. When the Coast Guard was returned to the Navy they lost those privileges, but men who have gone into the Coast Guard since 1922 are given the benefit of all of the pension laws, while the men who served during the war and who served previous to 1922 are deprived of those benefits. I believe it is only fair to those men, now that they are obliged to go and do Navy service and take the risks they are taking every day, that they should be given the benefit of those laws. I refer especially to the men who do the shore duty. I have an instance which I can bring to the attention of the House where a man in the Coast Guard Service going along on his patrol saw some men landing a boat.

He went to help them and they were bootleggers. They hit him with a bottle and broke his skull. He is dead and out of the service and left a wife and child who do not come within the provisions of the pension law. Now I do not think it is the intention of the House to do that, and I know the Chairman will accept the amendment of this kind, which I gave to him a few moments ago.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman offer the amendment?

Mr. TAGUE. I offer the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. TAGUE: Page 8, line 23, after the period, insert the following: "All pension laws applicable to the Army and Navy shall apply to the personnel of the Coast Guard who are now serving or who served in the Coast Guard subsequent to August 28, 1919."

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order.

Mr. HOCH. I make the point of order that the amendment is not germane to this bill or to this section.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 6. Under such regulations as he may prescribe, the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to appoint temporary warrant officers, and to make special temporary enlistments, in the Coast Guard. No person shall be entitled to retirement because of his temporary appointment or enlistment under this section.

Mr. WINSLOW. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: Page 3, line 24, before the word "under," insert "(a)," and on page 4, after line 3, insert the following new provision: "(b) Any enlisted man in the permanent Coast Guard may be appointed as a temporary warrant officer. Notwithstanding such temporary appointment any such enlisted man shall be entitled to retirement in the same manner as though he had continued to hold his permanent rating, and upon the termination of such temporary appointment shall be entitled to revert to such rating. Service under such temporary appointment shall be included in determining the length of service as an enlisted man."

Mr. BLANTON. I make a point of order this is looking entirely to a new subject and not germane to the other purposes of the bill or to the paragraph.

Mr. WINSLOW. It has the same purpose.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. FRENCH: On page 4, after line 3, insert a new section, as follows:

"SEC. 7. Temporary appointment of any member of the Naval Reserve Force to any enlisted or commissioned grade in the Coast Guard shall not prejudice his status in the Naval Reserve Force when his temporary services in the Coast Guard shall have terminated. While serving as Coast Guard the members of the Naval Reserve Force shall not be entitled to retainer pay or any other special privileges by reason of their temporary service in the Navy or Naval Reserve Force, except that service in the Coast Guard may be counted as service in the Naval Reserve Force."

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, the Coast Guard will probably draw its ablest men under this bill from the Naval Reserve. We have several thousand men who are now enrolled with the Naval Reserve or are members of the Fleet Reserve who have had years of naval service. Some of these men have served 16 years and some 20 years who are to-day drawing retainer pay. Those who served 16 years and under 20 draw retainer pay to the extent of 50 per cent of their rating in the naval service, and those who served 20 years are drawing two-thirds pay of their respective ratings upon retirement. Many of these men entered the Naval Reserve Force in order that we might reduce the size of the personnel of the Navy. In order to make an inducement for them to go into the Naval Reserve Force two or three years ago we passed a voluntary retirement law so they might occupy this status in the Naval Reserve Force and withdraw from the higher-paid ratings of the Navy. The effect of this amendment that I have offered will be to permit the Coast Guard to have the advantage of the long and valuable experience of these men, and not cause them to forfeit their right to be members of the Naval Reserve when they shall withdraw from the service with the Coast Guard.

Another provision is that during the period they may serve with the Coast Guard they will not receive retainer pay. Thus you will save to the Government probably thousands of dollars that you are now paying as retired pay or retainer pay. We are paying to men of the various classes to-day more than $5,000,000. They are men who are standing by; they are performing valuable service in standing by because they will be of incalculable service in the event of war. Here, however, is an opportunity for the Coast Guard to have the service of well-trained, valuable men, who thus will be retaining their efficiency, while, on the other hand, the Government will be spared the necessity of paying for their service as members of the reserve force.

Mr. BLANTON. I withdraw the point of order.

Mr. WINSLOW. The committee will not object to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I do so, Mr. Chairman, for the purpose of asking a question of any member of the committee who may be able to answer it. The question is this: Am I correct in assuming that the enlisted men who will man these boats will be employed only temporarily as per section No. 6? I ask this question for the reason that during the past summer I tried to obtain the release of an enlisted man in the Revenue Cutter Service, on the revenue cutter Tuscarora, operating on Lake Michigan, and was unable to obtain his speedy release, owing to the fact that efficient men were not at hand to fill the vacancy which would occur.

I can not see for one moment how you are going to procure competent and qualified enlisted men and a sufficient number of efficient enlisted men if you are going to employ them only for a temporary period, when they will not know whether it will be a week or a month.

Mr. BUTLER. If the gentleman will permit me, under the amendment which was just adopted, the one offered by the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. FRENCH], I can assure the gentleman that they are likely to get all they desire to have from what is known as the Reserve Force, men not actively employed.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 7. Nothing contained in this act shall operate to reduce the grade, rank, pay, allowances, or benefits that any person in the Coast Guard would have been entitled to if this act had not become law.

Mr. WINSLOW. Mr. Chairman, I would like to offer an amendment, to change the number "7" to the number "8" as a section number.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WINSLOW: Page 4, line 4, strike out the figure "7" and insert the figure "8."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered some time ago by the gentleman from New York [Mr. CELLER].

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Chairman, on page 4, line 7, after the word "law," insert a new section, to be known as section 9.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CELLER: Page 4, line 7, after the word "law," insert a new section, to be known as section 9, as follows: "Acts or parts of acts inconsistent with or contrary to the provisions of this act are hereby repealed."

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against that on the ground that it is not in order. That would repeal the naval act and many provisions of our Coast Guard act. It might repeal some of the provisions of our prohibition act, and it is not so intended. It is not in accordance with the purposes of the bill.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Chairman, will the Chair hear me on the point of order?

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order also, that this provision is not necessary and is purely surplus.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from New York [Mr. CELLER].

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Chairman, I have in mind a specific statute passed many years ago which undoubtedly would be inconsistent with some of the terms of this present enactment. That particular statute provides that all surplus vessels of the Navy are compelled to remain in convenient and ordinary ports. If you have such a statute, I can not see how the Navy can loan its vessels to the Coast Guard for the purposes enumerated in this bill. For that reason I think this amendment is quite proper and in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair held that the amendment could be offered, and overrules the point of order. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. WINSLOW. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill and amendments to the House with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. MADDEN, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having under consideration the bill (H. R. 6815) to authorize the temporary increase of the Coast Guard for law enforcement, had directed him to report the same back to the House with the sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. WINSLOW. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and all amendments to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put them en gross.

Mr. HILL of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, is it in order to move to recommit now?

The SPEAKER. It is not. The question is on agreeing to the amendments.

The amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill as amended.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I demand the reading of the engrossed copy.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas demands the reading of the engrossed copy. The engrossed copy is not ready.

ALLEGED CHARGES AGAINST TWO MEMBERS OF CONGRESS—INVESTIGATING COMMITTEE.

The SPEAKER. The Chair wishes to appoint as members of the committee authorized by the vote of the House to-day to consider the question of the report of the grand jury in Chicago Mr. BURTON, Mr. PURNELL, Mr. MICHENER, Mr. WINGO, and Mr. MOORE of Virginia.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Craven, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bills of the following titles:

H. R. 5337. An act granting the consent of Congress to construct a bridge over the St. Croix River between Vanceboro, Me., and St. Croix, New Brunswick;

H. R. 5348. An act granting the consent of Congress for the construction of a bridge across the St. John River between Fort Kent, Me., and Clairs, Province of New Brunswick, Canada; and

H. R. 5624. An act authorizing the construction of a bridge across the Ohio River to connect the city of Benwood, W. Va., and the city of Bellaire, Ohio.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed Senate joint resolutions of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. J. Res. 76. Joint resolution authorizing the maintenance by the United States of membership in the International Statistical Bureau at The Hague;

S. J. Res. 77. Joint resolution authorizing the appointment of delegates to represent the United States at the seventh Pan-American Sanitary Conference to be held at Habana, Cuba, in November, 1924; and

S. J. Res. 79. Joint resolution to provide for the representation of the United States at the meeting of the Inter-American Committee on Electrical Communications to be held in Mexico City beginning March 27, 1924.

SENATE JOINT RESOLUTIONS REFERRED.

Under clause 2, Rule XXIV, Senate joint resolutions of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees as indicated below:

S. J. Res. 76. Joint resolution authorizing the maintenance by the United States of membership in the International Statistical Bureau at The Hague; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

S. J. Res. 77. Joint resolution authorizing the appointment of delegates to represent the United States at the Seventh Pan-American Sanitary Conference to be held at Habana, Cuba, in November, 1924; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

S. J. Res. 79. Joint resolution to provide for the representation of the United States at the meeting of the Inter-American Committee on Electrical Communications to be held in Mexico City beginning March 27, 1924; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. JACOBSTEIN, by unanimous consent, was granted leave of absence, for one week, on account of illness.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. WINSLOW. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members shall be allowed five legislative days in which to extend their remarks on the bill (H. R. 6815) to authorize a temporary increase of the Coast Guard for law enforcement.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. UPSHAW. Mr. Speaker, does that allow me to extend my remarks on the bill just passed?

The SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. HERSEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on the resolution of investigation.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Maine?

There was no objection.

INCREASE OF COAST GUARD FOR LAW ENFORCEMENT.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, it seems because of prohibition we lose some of our senses. As soon as the word "prohibition" is mentioned, some of the Members of the House become mentally lopsided. H. R. 6815 authorizes an increase of the Coast Guard for prohibition enforcement and involves a yearly expenditure of $13,000,000. One can not look with complacency upon such a project. We recently voted $10,000,000 for the enforcement of prohibition and now we are to add $13,000,000 in a futile attempt to make the sea dry after having ingloriously failed to make the country dry. A careful reading of this bill shows it is merely a stalking horse for the use of the military and naval forces of the country for the enforcement of prohibition. The bill provides for the use of mine sweepers, torpedo boats, and many other engines of war.

Aside from common-sense objections there is to my mind a constitutional one. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] a moment ago asked anyone to tell him what constitutional objections there were and nobody seemed to answer him. I, however, reserved my right to answer until I had the floor.

Story on the Constitution says—

> The power to raise armies is an indispensable incident to the power to declare war.

And when the term "armies" is used it always means the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps.

The logical inference to be drawn is that the Army and the Navy are primarily vehicles for carrying on of war. It is true that the Coast Guard can be used in times of peace for the enforcement of civil law, but there is never found in the Coast Guard mine sweepers, torpedo boats, and destroyers. They would not dare use openly the vessels of the Navy to enforce prohibition. They simply transfer the naval vessels to the Coast Guard, and then have the hardihood to say that the Navy is not being used, but that it is the Coast Guard that is being used.

Hamilton, in the Federalist, many years ago said:

> It was said that Congress, having an unlimited power to raise and support armies, might, if in their opinion the general welfare required it, keep large armies constantly on foot and thus exhaust the resources of the United States. There is no control on Congress as to numbers, stations, or government of them. They may billet them on the people at pleasure. Such an unlimited authority is most dangerous and in its principles despotic, for, being unbounded, it must lead to despotism. We shall, therefore, live under a government of military force. In respect to times of peace it was suggested that there is no necessity for having a standing army, which had always been held under such circumstances to be fatal to public rights and political freedom.

I need not comment on the language used by Hamilton, but let me quote something else that is found in Story on the Constitution with reference to what the Attorney General said about the unconstitutionality of the bill before us:

It may be admitted that standing armies may prove dangerous to the State. But it is equally true that the want of them may also prove dangerous to the State. What, then, is to be done? The true course is to check the undue exercise of the power, not to withhold it. This the Constitution has attempted to do by providing that "no appropriation of money to that use shall be for a longer term than two years." Thus, unless the necessary supplies are voted by the representatives of the people every two years, the whole establishment must fall. Congress may, indeed, by an act for this purpose disband a standing army at any time, or vote the supplies only for two years or for a shorter period.

There is nothing in the bill which provides that these torpedo boats, revenue cutters, mine sweepers, and so forth, shall be used for a period of two years. The bill provides for their temporary use. The word "temporary" is relative and may mean one year or a dozen years. In so far as the appropriation is made for a period that may be longer than two years, I say that the act is unconstitutional. Furthermore, I call to mind that Chief Justice Taft, not so long ago, stated that the military and naval forces can not be used for the enforcement of civil law.

Article 1, section 8, clause 12, provides that—

Congress shall have power * * * to raise and support armies, but no appropriation of money to that use shall be for a longer term than two years.

Clause 13 provides that—

Congress shall have power * * * to provide and maintain a Navy.

Clause 14 provides that—

Congress shall have power * * * to make rules for the government and regulation of the land and naval forces.

These clauses contain the total sources of power of Congress over the Army and Navy. Careful search of the cases in the Supreme Court shows that this power involves power to conscript soldiers to suppress insurgency and rebellion; to establish naval academies; to provide for punishment of desertion and other crimes by courts-martial, and so forth; but nowhere do we find any express right given to use the military or naval arms of the Government to enforce our municipal or national law. In so far as the power of the Federal Government is a limited one, and furthermore, since the power to enact the instant proposal can not be found in any express or implied provision of the Constitution, I shall vote against it.

The people of the country are becoming restive under prohibition. They find homes invaded, their suit cases opened, and their public officials shot down in cold blood. There is no longer right of castle. Nothing is any longer sacred to the prohibition enforcement officials. How long must we endure it all? Prohibition has ushered in an utter disregard of law and order. Is it worth the price? Under the mockery of law enforcement we would fritter away the whole Treasury only to find more drinking and more drinkers. Prohibition is upon our backs like an incubus, breeding deceit, dishonesty, and chicanery.

Let me call attention to the fact that there has just been had a "wet" and "dry" poll of votes over the radio, conducted by the Zenith WJAZ broadcasting station at Chicago, Ill. The results were as follows:

Nearly 46,673 men and women throughout the United States telegraphed Station WJAZ between the hours 10 p. m., Saturday night, March 8, and 10 p. m., Sunday night, March 9.

These 46,673 people telegraphed their votes from every State in the Union, from homes on farms and in cities, from clubs and hotels, from mansions and from bungalows. No truer reflection of public opinion on the subject could be obtained—

United States wet	34,185
Total	46,668

The advocates of prohibtion are never satisfied. They will never learn. There are none so blind as those who will not see. These $23,000,000 we give is a rope of sand. Each year they will want more and more. They are as insatiate as the grave.

Is prohibition worth the price?

MEMORIAL ADDRESS ON WOODROW WILSON.

Mr. MAJOR of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert a memorial address delivered by Rev. J. Marvin Culbreth at the memorial services for Woodrow Wilson held at Fayette, Mo., on Sunday, February 10, 1924.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WOODROW WILSON—AN INTERPRETATION.

(By Rev. J. Marvin Culbreth.)

Every great man is, in part, the product of the soil to which he is attached. Changes in climate produce variations in character. With the very blood are mixed the elements which give distinctive richness to different localities.

Woodrow Wilson was nurtured, first of all, under the kindly shelter of Virginia mountains. His eyes early learned to gaze upon the summits of the hills that stood round about his valley home. All unaware, he imbibed something of their stability, grandeur, and majestic poise. Then he lived between the river and the sea. The river became to him a symbol of life rising in the mountain fastnesses and flowing to the plain, and passing on to mingle with "the murmurs and scents of the infinite sea." The marsh into which the ocean poured its tide sang to him in myriad voices of the "infinite greatness of God," and the sea itself boomed out to his listening ear the wisdom, the catholicity, of the human mind.

"Where cities did crowd to its edge
In a blacker incessanter line,"

Among the whispering oaks of Guilford County, N. C., he tarried for a while as a college student, and later adjusted himself to the sharply intellectual atmosphere of the East, where he received the final bent toward his career in the stormy arena of political action.

It is impossible to understand the career of Woodrow Wilson without admitting, to begin with, that he was a man of destiny.

He believed himself destined for greatness. As a youth he carried the air of one set apart for extraordinary undertakings. This may be accounted for in part by the theology in which he was nurtured. Calvinism was always right in teaching that God designed some men for greatness. Armenians are right, too, in believing that personal initiative and choice play a part. In his experience Wilson clearly enough combined the two systems. The gleam flashed before his eyes, and he followed it. The heavenly vision burst upon him, and he was not disobedient. It can not be doubted that in what he attempted as well as in what he so rigidly adhered to he was controlled by this abiding conviction. It is the one consideration which may explain what might be called his intellectual fanaticism. But this trait lay deeper than the dogmas of formal theology. It was centered in the magnetism of Jesus Christ, for Woodrow Wilson submitted to Him as the right man. His steadfastness of purpose was grounded in obedience to the captain of his soul.

It was a great mistake, as his political enemies as well as friends soon found out, to think of Mr. Wilson as an impractical school man elevated by the accidents of politics to the position of nominal leadership. Woodrow Wilson was trained for statecraft.

As an undergraduate he became interested in the study of the science of government. He deliberately divided his time between the subjects assigned in the curriculum and an independent investigation of the parliamentary system of Great Britain. At Johns Hopkins he pursued graduate courses in the same field. As lecturer at Princeton University he won fame as an authority in political science. It is not surprising that when he came to the Presidency he followed the conceptions of government which he had been maturing through all these years.

Those who would have used Mr. Wilson to serve their preferred designs could not have been ignorant of his academic equipment. What they failed to reckon with was his superb ability to "labor as he knew," to translate theory into fact, to exalt principle in courageous conduct.

The student of history is often surprised by the recurrence of absolutism in government. When parliamentary arrangements break down or themselves become oppressive, now and then a master will assumes control and rules by his own decision. Woodrow Wilson was an absolutist. Of course, there were checks and balances which he loyally recognized. But his was the spirit of an absolute ruler. The temper if not the blood of the Tudors was his heritage. He announced and upheld the principle that "the President is at liberty, both in law and conscience, to be as big a man as he can." The method of Woodrow Wilson as well as the results he achieved show a parallel to the spirit and deeds of a benevolent absolutist.

He found himself in the position of supreme command. He gave orders and required obedience. Then there was an outcry against Executive interference. Small men with only one thought, and that to cater to the aimless whims of a largely indifferent constituency, chafed under the authority of the President. Enemies without the party and also within raised the cry of revolt. Wilson has been bracketed with Lincoln as one who suffered at the hands of his contemporaries the bitterest denunciation and criticism. Some even among his warmest admirers called in question his wisdom and impeached his motives.

In his appraisal of Wilson, Lloyd-George says that "he walked on his weaker opponents, a dangerous policy for a great man. One can trample on great men, but not little men; there are too many of them." Was this, if true, due to "malice or cold disdain"? Was it an unfortunate manifestation of temperament? Or was it a necessary phase of Wilson's idealism? Of this I shall speak later. There is a more obvious justification for the President's absolutism.

Look at the work he accomplished. Take away his habit of command and you make impossible the shining achievements which signalized his career.

At Wesleyan College the young professor, also serving as coach, took a hopelessly outclassed football team and whipped it into shape to wrest victory from a university squad. "Go in to win" was the young professor's command to the faltering eleven. And they won.

At Princeton he set himself against the traditions of the school, defied the opposition of colleagues and students, and braved the wrath of an aroused alumni by seeking to make living conditions among the students more democratic.

As Governor of New Jersey one of his first acts was to compel party leaders to deal fairly with a man who had been nominated in the primary only to be threatened with rejection in the election by the perfidy of the party bosses. And the world plentifully applauded the vigorous laws he pushed through against predatory trusts.

When Mr. Wilson became President it was not by the deliberate choice of the people or because he was the leader of his party, but solely "by the negative merit of availability." He received only 6,291,000 votes, fewer than Bryan received each time he was defeated. He became a minority President and had behind him a party without a specific program.

But see what he accomplished.

The revision of the tariff, representing a reduction in the level of rates of at least 10 per cent.

The Federal reserve act, which "assumed the character of a political miracle."

The Children's Bureau, which was a first step toward lifting babies to an equal footing with pigs in the estimation of the Government.

The seamen's act, which applied humanitarian consideration to the treatment of American sailors in all parts of the world.

The repeal of the Panama tolls exemption bill by which America had evaded honorable engagements assumed in treaties with Britain and France.

The payment to Colombia of $25,000,000 for the territory taken for the use of the canal.

The Adamson law, recognizing the principle of union labor and establishing an 8-hour day for transportation industries.

Finally, the conduct of the war. The gigantic preparedness program, the miracle of thorough maintenance, the terrible effectiveness of force without stint in beating back the German millions.

Over against these victories there is recorded a single failure, a single defeat, so colossal in proportions, so full of possibilities of poignant suffering, that to many it outbalances all that was won. This was the failure of the effort of Mr. Wilson to commit America to an honorable participation in world peace as he had led his country in an honorable participation in the World War. His failure was attributed, even by many sincere friends, to his spirit of absolutism. For the sake of an empty show of ratifying the treaty, many counselors would have emasculated the President of the very virtue by which he had achieved success in former enterprises. Of this I shall speak again.

The matter that concerns us now is to understand the meaning of this defeat.

It is already clear enough that the failure to get the treaty ratified by the United States Senate furnishes the background against which the idealism of Woodrow Wilson is vividly shown. From the obscurest quarter of the globe have come recognitions of the transcendent unselfishness of our martyred President. His irreconcilable enemies have coupled their strongest denunciations with a confession of his surpassing idealism.

What kind of idealism was it that Woodrow Wilson had?

It was intelligible. And it was expansive. It was not capable of being contracted. It has proved intelligible to 51 nations! It is not fully comprehended yet, but it has made a successful initial appeal to uncounted millions of common people. And the limit of its power does not yet appear.

The cloven foot of the beast that turned America from following Wilson has been revealed in two very recent incidents. When certain Senators resorted to the puerile and contemptible attempt to compromise the American peace award, they betrayed the cunning and sinister motives which all along have actuated the enemies of the League of Nations. And when the German Government denied its representative the requested privilege of extending official condolence at the death of Mr. Wilson, the power that was largely responsible for his defeat in this, his own country, showed its hyphenated head.

But let us dismiss a phase of the subject so irritating, so revolting, and turn to the dream for which Mr. Wilson staked all and lost.

It was a dream of world peace based upon restitution for wrongs inflicted, confidence in diplomacy, frankness in dealing with the common people, equality of opportunity for all, and unfettered nationalism. He challenged the world to accept these aims. He called upon strong governments to assist the weak to become partners with themselves in the grand enterprise. He applied to the Nation the same rule of service that our Christian confession applies to the individual. He brought us measurably nearer to the day—

"When war drums throb no longer and the battle flags be furled
In the parliament of man, the federation of the world."

Finally, it is necessary to account for the fact that Woodrow Wilson's idealism survived the shock of defeat. It did so because the man was incorruptible.

There is undeniably pathos in his loss of friendships. But there is unmistakable grandeur and nobility in the fact Mr. Bryan, Mr. Garrison, Mr. Page, Mr. Lansing, to mention only the most conspicuous examples, failed to hold his confidence, though some of them may not have suffered in his esteem. To what is this painful inability to keep on terms with once trusted counselors ascribable? To peevish, unreasonable, arrogant, self-opinionated conceit? Many would have us think so. But there is a different explanation. It was due to his horror of betraying his ideal. When an opinion shaded off into disloyalty to his dream as he had conceived it and fought for it, he simply was bound to show antagonism. Who knows but that if those individuals closely connected with him in making the treaty had not weakened, had not advised concessions, the enemies of the covenant might never have gained strength for successful opposition. Woodrow Wilson could not be corrupted or weakened by the wavering of his chosen friends. For loyalty to his ideal he paid the price of separation from men whom he sorely needed and all too sadly missed.

So he was a pathetic figure as he neared the end. But in noble dignity he bore this affliction of the heart, as he endured the lesser affliction of the body, and closed his spoken message to the world that rejected him with the strangely apostolic words:

"I am ready!"

JAPANESE EXCLUSION.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a letter of Hon. James D. Phelan, a former Senator from California, on the subject of Japanese exclusion.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

JAPANESE EXCLUSION.

(An answer to Secretary Hughes's letter on the quota, by Hon. James D. Phelan.)

The Secretary of State has interposed an objection at the request of Japan to the provisions of the Albert Johnson bill, which was reported favorably from the House committee. He says he is not opposed to the exclusion of Japanese, but he thinks the best method would be to include Japan in the quota of 2 per cent which is granted European nations; that is, he was adopting the Japanese plea for racial equality which was denied on two occasions at the world conferences in Paris. The inequality of treatment is the constant cry of the Japanese and superficially makes an appeal to the thoughtless who do not understand its significance.

First, the Japanese protest against the alleged discrimination against them; but there is no discrimination when the case is analyzed, because the Federal Government by law for 130 years has drawn a distinction between those that are eligible to citizenship in the United States and those that are ineligible, which is a perfectly natural classification. Free white persons are alone eligible to citizenship, with the exception of the negro race, which was made as a war measure in 1870. So the Federal Government has excluded from immigration and citizenship all Asiatics because of their different race and nonassimilability, and to give the Japanese the same benefit of the quota law would be to discriminate in favor of them as against the Chinese, the Hindoos, the Siamese, and other proud and cultured people.

The ultimate purpose of the Japanese which we can not overlook is to establish themselves in this country on an equality with Europeans and thus enjoy citizenship, the voting privilege, the ownership of land, and other benefits which they do not now enjoy. If they were put under the quota law, they would win their first battle in their campaign for an acknowledgment of racial equality, and the gentlemen who have appeared for them before this committee have made that claim, but racial equality is something beyond the power of the Congress. It is based upon the racial differences which are innate and which causes repugnance on both sides to intermarriage. Herbert Spencer, dwelling on the biological facts of science, warned both the Japanese and the Americans from ever commingling, excepting in friendly commercial relationship; that the result of the crossing of divergent races is exceedingly detrimental to both. And Japan is strong to-day because, following Herbert Spencer's advice to her, they have maintained the purity of their race. They do not pretend that they even want to intermarry the whites, but they want to live in colonies which they have successfully established on the Pacific slope and increase and multiply.

The gentlemen's agreement, in lieu of an exclusion bill, was negotiated by Theodore Roosevelt as an experiment by which the Japanese themselves were given the privilege of determining who should come to the United States, with the understanding that she would refuse to issue passports to laborers, except an exempted class as officials, merchants, travelers, savants, and students. As a result, the Japanese population has greatly increased. They have not only come in the ports with student passports, but they have come in from Peru and Mexico and other points to which they have been shipped and surreptitiously entered the United States.

Thirty-eight thousand women, for instance, of Japanese birth have come into California since the gentlemen's agreement in 1908. These women are not only laborers, but are prolific wives who work almost uninterruptedly in the fields by the sides of their husbands. Of every 11 children born in California, 1 is now a Japanese, and in some parts of California, near Los Angeles and Sacramento, for instance, more than one-third of the births are Japanese.

The fact is that Japan is laying the foundation of a permanent colonization on the Pacific slope which will spread quickly to other parts of the West. It is apparent that the only way to check Japanese immigration is to impose an exclusion law such as we have against all other Asiatics. At present we have surrendered our sovereignty to Japan. Of course, the exempt class of merchants, scholars, etc., shall still enjoy the privileges of commerce, pleasure, and study, and may come and go freely, but the permanent settler, in the interests of Americans and American institutions, must be barred. It is to-day the national policy and the question is how best to make it effective.

The Taft treaty of 1911, bitterly opposed by Theodore Roosevelt, expired last July and may be terminated now on six months' notice. That gives free entry for trade to all Japanese and is only limited by the gentlemen's agreement which is not kept in good faith.

Former President Taft suggested in his speech yesterday to the Japanese society that a conference, such as the Disarmament Conference, be held between the Japanese and the Americans, which would be very pleasing to the Japanese because, as it has been said, "America never lost a war and never won a conference." Our diplomacy in Asiatic matters has been utterly eclipsed by the Japanese and has been a reproach to our untrained statesmen and to the American name. We had better avoid conferences and honestly and frankly adopt the correct method, which is to do directly what we want to do in dealing with this, which is conceded to be a domestic question. A man should be the judge of the guests of his own house, and it is not only irregular but impertinent for others to seek admission. No offense can possibly be taken by Japan if this is done in a manly way for reasons which she will understand. She excludes the Chinese and Koreans from Japan, although they are racially not very divergent, if at all.

The trouble has been the subservient character of our Government, actuated by fear mostly, in dealing with Japan. The dignity and strength of the United States has been demonstrated since Theodore Roosevelt negotiated a gentlemen's agreement to avert what he believed a menace of war. There is more danger of war in the creation of domestic friction by the warring of the races than in politely refusing the Japanese demand which has been presented to the committee by missionary societies and high officials.

The three branches of the Government should maintain their independence. The executive should not interfere with the legislative or the judiciary. The judiciary has, in spite of misgivings expressed by the State Department, sustained the antialien land laws of California, Washington, Oregon, and six other States. Let Congress act and let the State Department use its diplomacy in carrying out firmly and not falteringly the American policy.

If the State Department does not give six months' notice of the termination of the treaty of 1911 and negotiate a new treaty, which is in order, the act of Congress will operate as a repeal of the treaty and the establishment of a principle which can not be compromised.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Haltigan, one of its clerks, announced that the House had agreed to the amendment of the Senate to the title of the bill (H. R. 7039) to amend section 72 of chapter 23, printing act approved January 12, 1895.

AGRICULTURAL DIVERSIFICATION.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The unfinished business, Senate bill 2250, is before the Senate and will be proceeded with.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 2250) to promote a permanent system of self-supporting agriculture in regions adversely affected by the stimulation of wheat production during the war and aggravated by many years of small yields and high production costs of wheat.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending question is on the amendment proposed by the junior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. BURSUM].

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I do not believe that it is necessary to take up much of the time of the Senate in further discussion of the pending measure. The conditions throughout the West especially are generally known by Senators. The question before us is how to meet that situation, if at all. The one proposition contained in the original bill is to furnish livestock, or funds with which to enable the farmers in certain sections of the country to raise a diversity of crops. That phase of the situation has been discussed at very great length.

The situation is brought about in two ways or for two principal reasons: First, the inducements which were held out to the people of some of the Northwestern States to produce wheat during the war. The map on the wall clearly shows just what happened. The people of those States responded to the call of the Government and produced wheat in larger amounts than they otherwise would have done. Following the war, for various reasons, the banking facilities of the country have been very greatly reduced. In a number of sections the banks are closed entirely and where they are not closed they have not the funds to loan to the people of the respective communities in order that business may go on in the usual course. Those factors constitute the situation calling for relief and the purposes of the bill and the amendment which my colleague has proposed to it.

I think that the loaning of funds to those Northwestern States is justified under the circumstances. That question has been discussed. I believe the Congress of the United States ought to go a step further and put funds at the disposal of the banks of the country where the resources have been depleted for reasons which I do not now need to recall, so that the business of the country may go on. There are many communities in the United States without banking facilities at all, a situation brought about by the extraordinary conditions which have prevailed in recent years. The amendment proposed by my colleague does nothing more than to put at the disposal of those communities and the banks in those communities funds which will enable them to transact ordinary business and go ahead with the business of the country, which must be carried on if those communities are ever to be restored to a normal state of prosperity.

That is the question. The measure does not provide for any gift of money. It provides that the security shall be ample; that where the loans are to be made to individuals by the Comptroller of the Currency it shall be done upon adequate security, and where the banks which exist to-day and which are solvent have not funds to furnish the community with which to do business it provides for deposit of funds with those solvent banks. So there is no element of risk in that situation of any magnitude which would affect the proposition. It is simply a question whether we shall make available to those communities which are without banking facilities, without current assets with which to carry on the business of the country, sufficient funds to enable them to go on with the ordinary business affairs.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from New Mexico a question?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I am glad to yield to the Senator.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Does the amendment attempt to regulate the rate of interest which the banks and trust companies are to charge for the loans?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I am not sure as to that. I think it is provided that the rate of interest to be charged by the Comptroller of the Currency shall not exceed the rate of interest charged by the Federal reserve system in the section of country where the loans are made, and the amendment does provide for the money at that rate of interest.

It is just a question whether we want to do this thing or not. I say to the Senate that there is a very great necessity that something shall be done. If this amendment be adopted, I apprehend that there will be very much less done under the provisions of the original bill. If we can make this money available to banks upon good security, then the banks will take care of a great many of the people who would otherwise be calling for livestock and other accommodations under the other provisions of the bill.

Mr. President, I do not want to take up the time of the Senate in a discussion of the amendment. I believe we are all familiar with the conditions which exist, and I believe that this measure will in a very sane way furnish very great relief in many communities of the United States.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SPENCER in the chair). The question is upon the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. BURSUM].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, when it became necessary to draft the railroads for the more effective performance of our part in the World War, as it had already been necessary to draft human beings, the railroads were guaranteed by law a compensation equal to their average annual operating income for the preceding three fiscal years, and where they had been earning no income for the preceding three fiscal years and where for any reason this basis was shown to be impracticable or unfair, just compensation or, I may say, adjusted compensation was assured by law.

In addition the agreements by which the railroads were placed under Government control provided for maintenance, repair, renewals, and depreciation, and such adjustments of operating income and Government contribution as would secure the return of the railroads at the end of war control in substantially as good repair and with substantially as complete equipment as at the beginning of such control.

Hundreds of millions of dollars were appropriated from the Treasury for the railroads to enable the Government to carry out its part of these guaranties and agreements. The railroads complained that their operating expense was advanced under Government war control out of all proportion to the increases in rates, mainly through enhanced wages to employees, and yet the Esch-Cummins Act of 1920, passed by Congress shortly before the return of the railroads to private control, directed the Interstate Commerce Commission to prescribe rates sufficient to pay all operating costs and also a fair return on the aggregate value of railroad property. The rates put into effect by the Interstate Commerce Commission in obedience to that direction enabled the railroads to earn in 1922 on every dollar of gross income 15 cents above all operating expenses and taxes; to earn up to the close of that year from the time the Esch-Cummins Act went into effect a net return of 3½ per cent on the valuation of nearly $19,000,000,000, the tentative valuation fixed by the Interstate Commerce Commission as a fair value as of December 31, 1919; and to earn for 1923 a net railway operating income of about 5 per cent on that valuation. In addition, the Esch-Cummins Act guaranteed to the railroads for six months after the termination of Government control an operating income equal to half the compensation they had been guaranteed during such control.

Furthermore, a fund of $300,000,000 was appropriated by the Esch-Cummins Act from the Treasury for loans to be available to railroads at 6 per cent, with a maximum time for repayment of 15 years, for the purpose of meeting existing debts, purchasing equipment, additions, and betterments.

Furthermore, the Esch-Cummins Act provided that for two years the Interstate Commerce Commission in fixing rates should take as a fair return on the aggregate value of railroad properties a sum equal to 5½ per cent of such value, and in its discretion might add a sum equal to another half per cent for the improvements, betterments, and equipment chargeable to capital account. Under the Esch-Cummins Act passenger rates have been doubled and freight rates have been more than doubled as compared with 1913.

Mr. President, by what distortion of human logic is a Government loan to a railroad denominated justice while a Government loan to a farmer is branded as socialism? The farms are, in the last analysis, more essential to the public welfare than the railroads.

Shortly after the Esch-Cummins Act, with its provisions making possible net returns above all expenditures for the railroads and safeguarding them against the uncertainties and perils of post-war conditions, the American farmer, by the deflation policy of our Government, was literally pitchforked over the precipice of the most sudden and disastrous decline in agricultural values any country or any period ever witnessed. That recession sent millions of farmers into bankruptcy and ruin and thousands to poverty and despair.

Now, when Government assistance is requested to aid in his recovery from war and post-war emergencies, the farmer is told to look to his own resources; that there is no help for him from a Treasury that has been a veritable fountain of benevolence and paternalism for the railroads. I protest against this attitude. The trouble is that the American Congress does not appreciate and understand the plight of agriculture. It does not grasp the fact that agriculture, as a paying occupation for the individual who actually tills the soil, is threatened with extinction, so far as an American standard of living is concerned, and that the most far-reaching measures are needed if agriculture is properly to survive.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, I offer an amendment in the nature of a substitute for the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the amendment.

The principal clerk proceeded to read the amendment.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, I request unanimous consent that the amendment may not be read, as it is identical with the bill as it now stands before the Senate, with certain modifications in section 2.

Mr. BURSUM. I ask that the proposed substitute may be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the amendment.

The PRINCIPAL CLERK. It is proposed to strike out all after the enacting clause and to insert the following:

That it is hereby declared in the public interest that conditions existing in those portions of the United States known particularly as the wheat areas, resulting from the stimulation of wheat growing during the recent war and aggravated during subsequent years by low yields and high costs of production, should be changed through the encouragement of a system of agriculture not dependent for its success upon wheat alone, but cultivation would include the raising of livestock, such as dairy and beef cattle, hogs, sheep, poultry, and the products thereof.

SEC. 2. That from the approval of this act and until June 30, 1926, the Secretary of Agriculture shall be empowered and authorized to purchase livestock, including dairy and beef cattle, hogs, and sheep, suitable for the development of a system of agriculture as contemplated by the purposes of this act, and to sell the same to farmers upon the contract installment plan, all deferred payments to bear interest at not to exceed 6 per cent per annum. No contract shall run for more than five years or be for more than $1,000, and the title of the livestock, including the natural increases thereof, shall remain in the United States until paid for. Such contracts shall be in the form and contain such provisions as may be prescribed by the Secretary of Agriculture.

For the purposes of this act a farmer is defined as a person engaged in and dependent upon agriculture for the support of himself and his family, whether in the capacity of owner, tenant, or cropper. (Such sales shall be made only to such farmers in the wheat areas of the country as are not reasonably able through their own resources or through existing credit facilities to initiate upon their farms a system of diversified farming, but who show their willingness to enter upon such an undertaking and who may be reasonably expected to develop such a system if given aid and opportunity. No sale shall, however, be made to any farmer who has overdue principal and interest or general obligations likely to result in early foreclosure of mortgages or other liens upon his farm lands or necessary farm equipment unless extension shall be granted by his creditors in such form as will give him a reasonable opportunity to work out his future and to get an ultimate benefit from such purchase of livestock.

The Secretary shall avail himself of such information as can be furnished by the agricultural colleges of the various States and other agricultural authorities and agencies, including also the Federal land bank system and the intermediate credit system, in determining what may be appropriate systems of agriculture for a given area and for information with reference to all related subjects. The Secretary shall arrange with county boards, county commissioners, or other local advisory committees or agencies for initial assistance and subsequent supervision as it may deem proper to promote the efficient accomplishment of the purposes of this act, and may do all things necessary in locating, purchasing, and transporting the required suitable livestock. The Secretary may also, in his discretion, utilize agencies existing at State agricultural colleges, including cooperative agricultural extension forces to assist him in carrying out the provisions of this act, and may reimburse such colleges for the necessary expenses incurred at the request of the Secretary: Provided, That regular employees of agricultural colleges or cooperative extension workers shall not be authorized to pass upon applications for purchases, nor shall they be utilized in other than a general advisory capacity in the purchase of livestock: Provided further, That there shall be no preference for or discrimination against members of any farm organization in carrying out the provisions of this act.

SEC. 3. That for carrying out the purposes of this act, it is hereby authorized to be appropriated the sum of $50,000,000, of which not more than $20,000,000 shall become available during the present fiscal year, not more than $20,000,000 during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1925, and not more than $10,000,000 during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1926, but any portion so authorized to be appropriated and remain available for the ensuing fiscal year. When made available said amounts may be paid to the Secretary from time to time as he may certify its requirements to the Secretary of the Treasury of payments from sales whether of principal or interest made during the period in which the Secretary exercises his hereunder powers are to be credited by the Treasury to the Secretary and may be expended by the Secretary within the purposes of this act.

SEC. 4. The Secretary is authorized to provide by regulation or otherwise for the repayment or collection of all amounts, including interest, in respect of any sale made under the provisions of this act. There is hereby established in the Treasury a fund to be known as the "livestock sale fund," and all such amounts repaid or collected shall be covered into such fund, and are reserved, set aside, and appropriated, to be available until June 30, 1926, for the use of the Secretary in accordance with the provisions of this act. After June 30, 1926, all amounts remaining in such fund, and all amounts, including interest, repaid or collected in respect of any such sale, shall be covered into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts.

SEC. 5. That any person who shall knowingly make any false representation for the purpose of obtaining livestock under this act shall, upon conviction thereof, be punished by a fine of not exceeding $1,000 or by imprisonment not exceeding six months, or both.

SEC. 6. That the Secretary shall submit a report of his operations to the President at such times as he may request, and shall submit such a report to Congress at the beginning of each regular session.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, as I have stated before, in connection with another amendment, I am in favor of the purposes of this bill. I am in favor of the purposes of the bill because while the country at large last year enjoyed a great average prosperity, the prosperity was not equally distributed among the industries of the Nation. The agricultural industry has suffered, and suffered severely. If it had enjoyed the average prosperity of the country last year there would be no demand for a measure of this character; but, as has been stated by the Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD], steps have been taken by Congress in the past to provide assistance for certain industries that were in trouble. He spoke of the transportation industry. Congress advanced to the railroads in the neighborhood of $500,000,000, and not upon prior lien securities, but upon other mortgage security. In fact, the Government has bought the securities of railroad companies, and in several instances no return or only a small return of principal will ever be obtained. Take, for instance, the Mexico & Orient Railroad to which advances were made; it is not probable that we will recover any great portion of that loan. If we favor one industry in this manner why should we not extend the same consideration to another industry? I will acknowledge that I do not approve of the general principle, but inasmuch as we have taken this position with reference to one industry why should we exclude agriculture from equal treatment?

It is for this reason that I am in favor of the purposes of this bill, and because there is necessity. It will afford relief where relief is needed at this time.

But what is Congress proposing to do in this connection? It is proposing to go into the business of loaning money to individuals. What is the class of individuals, from a commercial point of view, to whom Congress proposes to loan this money? To individuals who have no credit in a commercial sense. Consider one of these individuals. He might enter the door of a bank in his nearest town and ask for a loan, and he would be refused. Why? Because he was not entitled to a loan in the usual banking sense; yet he could leave that bank and go to an installment house, a furniture store, next door, and buy all the furniture that was necessary to furnish his home, even though he had no credit. Why? Because a plan has been devised whereby such a thing can be safely done. It is known as the contract-installment plan.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. HOWELL. I do.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I am very deeply interested in the idea proposed by the Senator from Nebraska, particularly because in my State there is a very thriving and a very commendable corporation that is engaged in loaning money to farmers on just exactly that installment plan for the purpose of purchasing dairy stock. In the case of a man who has not any particular banking credit, if he has a farm and is fairly well equipped to take care of dairy stock, they loan him the money to pay for the dairy stock, and he pays for it on the installment plan. I think the plan is a most excellent one, but it occurred to me that that could be accomplished by the bill as it reads now. It provides:

> The Secretary may purchase such livestock and supply same to the borrower at cost; such advances, loans, or sales shall be made upon such terms and conditions and subject to such regulations as the Secretary may prescribe, including provision for the repayment thereof by amortization or otherwise.

Mr. HOWELL. That is true. The Secretary could proceed according to this plan, but the bill does not make it compulsory for him to do so.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Quite right.

Mr. HOWELL. My idea is this: Whenever the Government enters the business field it should run that business for blood. It should adopt the best possible business methods and should not indulge in any deviations therefrom. Therefore, as there is a method whereby one not entitled to credit at a bank can buy merchandise—yes, can buy livestock—why should we not adopt that plan?

What is this plan? The plan is to sell the merchandise or the livestock to the individual upon the terms of a conditional contract. One of the conditions of that contract is that the title of the property shall remain in the vendor until paid for; and there are other conditions provided, such as that the property can be taken in case there is any danger of loss because of the negligence of vendee.

That is a method that is recognized all throughout this country; and, as I stated the other day, for three and a half years I conducted such a business in connection with a public enterprise, the gas plant in Omaha, Nebr., and during that three and a half years we sold in the neighborhood of a million dollars' worth of appliances and utensils, and during that period our losses amounted to only about a quarter of 1 per cent. In fact, when I closed my service I think there were delinquencies amounting to but $3,000. This plan works out, and, as stated, it has been utilized in connection with livestock.

I used to own a ranch out in the western country. I went out there in 1888; and one of the plans that was in vogue at that time and is in vogue at the present time was, where a man had neither money nor credit with which to buy livestock, some one who had livestock would turn over to him under contract a certain number of cows or a certain number of sheep, and he would run them, and in return would be entitled to from a third to a half of the increase, the balance of the increase going to the owner of the stock.

That is a plan that has been carried out time and time again, and the owner of the stock usually expected to make from 15 to 25 per cent upon his investment. If there is a well-recognized method that can be adopted by the Government with assurances of return of the principal invested, why should we not adopt it? If the plan that is proposed in this bill—I am speaking about the optional plan of making loans—were adopted by any installment house, the institution would go broke; but here, set forth in this substitute, is a plan that will work out.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Nebraska has expired.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, I also have 10 minutes on the bill which I have not utilized.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Has the Senator spoken upon the bill?

Mr. HOWELL. I have not spoken upon the bill. I spoke upon one amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has the floor.

Mr. HOWELL. This substitute makes this plan mandatory. Otherwise, it does not change the bill as it is now before the Senate, except that it eliminates poultry. The only reason why I have submitted a substitute, and not an amendment, is because certain wording in the other paragraphs had to be changed, as from "loans" to "purchase" or "sale." If this plan should be adopted, one of the probable abuses of the proposed method of making loans would be avoided.

For instance, suppose a farmer is indebted to a bank and the bank has a mortgage upon his livestock. The bank might say: "Here, we need money. We will foreclose the mortgage on your livestock, then you go and borrow at 5 or 6 per cent from the Government, and we will sell back your livestock." This thing could go on, and the Government thus be substituted in connection with a lot of loans now being carried by banks.

Again, anyone charged with making these loans, after he had made the loans as prescribed by Congress for a period of five years, would feel that he had done his duty, and that if at the end of five years the Government did not get back its money he was not responsible. Under this contract plan, however, the Secretary of Agriculture will be responsible for the livestock sold, and he will have to look out for it, see that the property is watched. If anyone who has been furnished livestock is not taking care of it, if he is neglecting it, it can be immediately taken back and sold under this contract without going through foreclosure proceedings, without delay. It can be taken over, disposed of promptly, and the Government protected. In other words, we would be adopting a method whereby the Secretary of Agriculture would be responsible for results, and if he exercises due care there will be comparatively little loss to the Government.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for just a moment?

Mr. HOWELL. Certainly.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Does the Senator believe it humanly possible that the Secretary of Agriculture, through a corps of inspectors, could actually watch the condition of all this livestock scattered over four or five States?

Mr. HOWELL. I recognize that it is a great task, but a great amount of money is involved.

Mr. WADSWORTH. It is involved in little, tiny driblets.

Mr. HOWELL. I realize that; but, as I say, a large amount of money is involved, and if we are going to pass this bill we certainly ought to take every precaution we can think of, and one or two more.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I agree with the Senator's last statement.

Mr. HOWELL. I think that is exactly what we should do in this connection. Then, after taking every precaution, if we meet with loss, if the administration is defective, we can not help it, but we will have done all that is humanly possible under the circumstances to make the plan workable and make the loss the least possible to the Government.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, may I inquire of the Senator how the farmer who borrows the money and undertakes to pay it back with 6 per cent interest is going to have any resources out of which to refund? If the title to all the stock and the increase is to remain in the Government he can not dispose of it. I grant that the Government would be better protected under the Senator's plan than under this one because if the title to this personal property rested in the Government, if the possessor undertook to dispose of it he would be guilty of a criminal offense. The Government would be protected not only from that standpoint but from the standpoint of not being obliged to institute foreclosure proceedings and incur the delay and cost and expense of foreclosure.

I am at a loss to know how you are going to enable the farmer to pay back a loan. If you hold possession of or title to all the property you sell him, including all the increase, where is he to get any income out of which to pay back his loan?

Mr. HOWELL. One of the provisions of the contract would be that the stock could be sold, the old stock for slaughter, the young stock for other purposes, under certain conditions, and the conditions would be those that would be prescribed by the Secretary and carried out through his representative in that district. A certain proportion of the money, or the whole of it, would be paid back. That can be all arranged in the contract. That is arranged for in contracts such as I have spoken of where individuals turn cattle over to farmers to run or raise on shares. The same plan could be carried out in connection with this bill, and if we can not provide a procedure of this character I do not think the Government is justified in embarking in such business. I feel that way about it.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, does the Senator really think that the Government has any business going into transactions of this sort anyhow? If it does, what becomes of the theory of more business in Government and less Government in business? If we are going to transform the Treasury of the United States into a mercantile establishment doing business on the installment plan, what becomes of that theory which prevailed so in the last presidential campaign, of more business in Government and less Government in business?

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, I will answer that question in this way: I think there is an emergency in this case, and the Senator knows that legislation is usually governed by precedent.

Mr. GLASS. I know it should not be governed by a wretchedly bad precedent.

Mr. HOWELL. I admit that to be true, and it is a fact that in public affairs we ought to be very careful about establishing precedents, because they do govern. The Government has established a precedent in its treatment of the transportation industry, and the agricultural industry now comes and says, "We would like equal treatment."

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, I do not agree with that proposition at all. We have heard an exposition of it, I think based entirely upon a misapprehension of the facts.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, could I yield the floor to the Senator and then reply to him? I would like to do that.

Mr. GLASS. I will speak in my own time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nebraska has the floor.

Mr. HOWELL. I would like to answer the Senator's question, but I have only a few minutes more. In public affairs, Mr. President, we are largely governed by precedent, and we ought to be careful about establishing precedents. But we have established a precedent of this character. We loaned the railroads $500,000,000, and we did not take their notes secured by bonds.

Mr. GLASS. The Government took their property. It turned out every officer they had. It substituted its own officials. It consolidated their offices, their agencies. It consolidated their rolling stock. It took possession of them for war purposes, to transport provisions and to transport troops in order to win the war. It is not a precedent at all, I submit, Mr. President.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, we took over the railroads, true, and we paid them the greatest return they ever enjoyed for a similar period of years in their history. Then we turned them back, and they asked us to loan them $500,000,000, and we loaned them $500,000,000 and took second-mortgage bonds; and some of that money we will never get back. We established a precedent there, and now here is another industry that comes forward——

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President, we fixed the wages the railroads should pay their employees. We fixed the rates for which they should carry freight, and we fixed the dividends they should pay to their stockholders.

Mr. HOWELL. Yes, Mr. President, and in passing the Esch-Cummins law, which fixed the rates—minimum rates—and in doing so this Government took the greatest step toward socialism that has ever been taken in the history of the United States. What is the purpose of socialism?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, I was not a Member of the Congress of the United States when the Esch-Cummins bill was under discussion, and I am not here now to justify it. As a matter of fact, I drafted that provision of the Democratic national platform at San Francisco which severely criticized the passage of the Esch-Cummins law, and committed my party to a modification of its terms, if not its repeal, later. Therefore it may be seen that I am no apologist for the Esch-Cummins law. But there is no analogy at all between this proposition to transform the United States Treasury into a mercantile establishment to be conducted on the installment plan, and what the Congress did in passing the Esch-Cummins law.

If there were, Mr. President, if the Esch-Cummins law, as the Senator has insisted, was the greatest stride toward socialism we have ever taken, it seems to me that ought to cause us to pause and to put a restraint upon the Congress of the United States, that we may not further indulge in this kind of socialism. But, as I indicated awhile ago, it is not an analogy.

The railroads of this country had literally broken down, financially and physically, thereby threatening this Nation as the result of their inability to function. They were headed right for the rocks. Their credit was impaired, their whole equipment was inadequate, and it was essential in those circumstances that the Government should take possession of the railroads, and unify them, and devote them to the purposes of the war. That was the only justification for the step we took.

We dismissed the leading officers of all the railroads. We took possession of their administration and of their operation. We unified their rolling stock. We increased the wages of their employees, in competition with private industry. For the given period this Government owned the railroads for its purposes.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. GLASS. I yield.

Mr. EDGE. I am simply going to say, following the argument of the Senator from Virginia, that the two cases are hardly parallel. When we took over the railroads we did not do it because the railroad management wanted us to do it at all. It was simply a matter of necessity, to help win the war.

Mr. GLASS. Oh, yes; I think the railroad managers wanted us to do it. I think they were greatly relieved that we did do it. I think they felt that they were escaping a humiliating experience when the Government took them over, because they had reached the point where they could not function under their own diverse managements. But it is not an analogy to this proposition in any sense, Mr. President. That was solely a war measure; it could be justified on no other ground or reason on earth.

As to a guaranty to the railroads and a bounty to the railroads, I have not understood it in the way the Senator states it. I have understood the matter, not well, I am sure, because I was not a Member of Congress when it was being discussed; but the Interstate Commerce Commission primarily is charged with the function of fixing railroal rates. That is a part of its business. The Esch-Cummins law, as I understand, simply undertook to define what was the reasonable rate which the Interstate Commerce Commission might fix to insure a fair return upon the investment of the railroad.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President——

Mr. GLASS. Just one moment. I am not a lawyer, as the Senator is, and I can not talk readily on my feet.

A maximum rate was fixed, but the Government never paid the railroads the difference between that maximum rate and their actual earnings, which did not reach that maximum rate. So that in the large sense there was no guaranty. I confess that I am ill informed upon the details of that rate-making part of the scheme; but, in the last analysis, that was a war measure. It was an absolute necessity, in order to preserve the life of this Nation and to win the war; and while I think perhaps the railroads have been dealt with too generously in the interpretation of the terms of the Esch-Cummins law, that does not justify the Congress of the United States six years after the war is over in transforming the United States Treasury into a mercantile establishment to go out and loan money on the installment plan.

Mr. President, I do not know what is to become of us if we proceed in this fashion. Whose money are we to loan? The United States Government has no money of its own. The only way on earth it can get a dollar into its Treasury is by taking it out of the pockets of the American taxpayers. Loan whose money on the installment plan or any other plan? When was it ever known before, until in this hectic period, that it was a function of government to take money out of the pockets of the people and loan it to special interests, on the installment plan or upon any other device?

Oh, Mr. President, I have as much affection for the farmer and as much interest in his welfare as anybody else. I want to preserve the respect of the 1,069,000 farmers in my own State, and I covet that a long way more than I covet their votes or their support at an election. I want them to think that I have some intellectual integrity, to be applied in the consideration of their interests in the Congress of the United States, and I am unwilling to tax them further and to take their money to loan to farmers or railroads or industrial enterprises, or to anybody else. When I go to them for an accounting I want to be able to say that I have taxed them for governmental purposes alone, to administer their Government in the most economical way possible, and upon fair and just considerations.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I had occasion on the 10th of the month to offer some observations respecting this bill, and considered at that time some of the amendments which were proposed. I have not time now to go into it, even if I desired to.

I have been through the vast and most admirable region of our country which it is sought to benefit by this measure. I would not venture to speak from my own personal knowledge of conditions there, particularly as against those who are more familiar with those conditions and who live in that region; but on the 10th instant I had inserted in the RECORD certain communications from actual farmers engaged in the business of agriculture in Montana, Utah, and North Dakota, and also an editorial from the Fargo Forum.

These people speak out as to what they themselves want. One of them, for instance, Mr. Underwood, said:

> That is one of our present difficulties, that we have had too much money loaned to us already. For goodness sake stop it. We need no more credit. But what we do need is an opportunity to obtain a fair price for what we need, purchase for our needs at a fair price, a chance to produce and to pay off what we do owe.
> An honest medical practitioner called to attend a member of your family first seeks to discover and remove the cause of the illness. It is not likely that he would seek to cure a candy-colicky sick child by giving it more candy when it required pills.
> There is no need for congressional aid for diversification whatsoever.

And all along the same line letters from other farmers in those regions come in. This morning I received a very sensible letter, which speaks for itself. I shall not attempt to comment on it, but I want to read it as a statement from a man on the ground who is thoroughly acquainted with conditions out there:

> Senator FLETCHER: I see by the Fargo Daily Tribune that you are opposing the Norbeck-Burtness bill. If it is any encouragement to you to know that this bill is not sponsored by the real dirt farmers of this State, then this letter will not be for nothing. At no meeting of farmers that I have heard of has this bill been indorsed. On the other hand, a meeting of farmers at York passed resolutions saying it was of very little benefit to the farmer. It is backed by bankers and townspeople who expect to handle the money or don't know what the farmer needs.
> Thousands of cows that I think were better than the ones that will be bought with this money were shipped out of the State last fall for want of feed. Before we get this stock they speak of we must have buildings, fences, and feed. When we get these we will have no trouble getting the stock. They say it is the nonpartisan who wants this law—I mean the people of the East—but I have never heard a nonpartisan say he wants the bill to become a law. I don't want to mix politics in this letter, but as I am a nonpartisan, I assume the right to refute this one of their many lies. I am an American of many generations; for that reason I can not but look with disfavor on any project that will set a dangerous precedent. We are hard off financially, but I think this can be said of a great many of the citizens of your State. We have had more publicity—that is the difference. The people that are supposed to be starving up here don't miss a dance or a show when it comes to town. They all wear good clothes. The great trouble is we have more banks than we need. Competition has caused them to take on creditors that were trying to live on their nerve. This, with the deflation of every thing agriculturally, has got our banks in bad. They will have to go some time. This loan may prolong their existence.

C. L. POTTENGER.

Mr. WARREN. From what locality does the letter come?

Mr. FLETCHER. From Fillmore, N. Dak.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President, the Senator from Florida has read a letter from a farmer in North Dakota who is not supplied with barns or fences or stock, and evidently he will not be benefited by this loan. I happen to have a letter from a farmer in Minnesota who is well supplied with barns and fences and stock. It is a letter written to the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SHIPSTEAD].

Mr. OVERMAN. The letter read by the Seantor from Florida, which was written by a North Dakota farmer, is as good an argument against the bill as has been made on this floor.

Mr. McLEAN. I was about to supplement it with a letter from a farmer in Minnesota who is supplied with all the tools of which the North Dakota farmer is deprived. This Minnesota farmer has barns and stock and fences and he has had a pretty serious experience. His investment now is something like $28,000. He says he works 14 to 16 hours a day. In 1922 he sold tons of cattle at less than 2 cents a pound in St. Paul, hogs at $7.50 a hundred. One shipment of 24 2-year-old ewes, weighing 3,150 pounds, brought him the munificent sum of $116, and 400 pounds of wool in 1921 brought him $32.16. He sold one load of hand-picked Ohio potatoes, 2,650 pounds, and received a check for $7.99. That, of course, did not pay for the digging and picking.

He goes on to say that he is losing about $2,000 on his farm every year—why? Because he has no market. He tells Senator SHIPSTEAD that he wants a market for his products, and he is a wise man. He does not suggest to the Senator that he wants us to take $50,000,000 out of the Treasury of the United States for the purpose of supplying other stock raisers in his section with more cattle and more hogs and more sheep to try to sell them in a market that is already glutted. This is a very interesting letter. I do not want to take the time to read it all, but I do not think the Senator from Minnesota will find in the letter very much encouragement for the bill. This farmer wants a market, and unless he gets it the bill is going to do absolute harm to the class of farmers he represents, and he says he represents 90 per cent of them. This bill will do great harm by recapitalizing the farmers whose capital is impaired and putting them in direct competition with farmers who now can not get enough for their stock to pay expenses.

Mr. HARRELD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McLEAN. I can not yield because I have only five minutes.

Stop for a moment and consider just how the bill would operate. The Secretary of Agriculture, we can safely assume, I think, can not attend to this matter personally and will choose an agent for the purpose, a sort of agricultural Gabriel, who will go out into Minnesota and North Dakota with a $50,000,000 horn and blow it and the farmers will all rise up, for the judgment day has come. What does the judge do? He reverses the order we read about in the Bible. If a man has anything, if he has done well, he will be put into the goat pen and he can not get a dollar. But the fellow who is insolvent, who used bad judgment, who has been extravagant, goes into the sheep pen and the judge puts some real sheep in with him, and he is allowed to pay for them on the installment plan. That is the way the bill would operate. It will not benefit anyone who has been careful in his expenditures and who has been economical. It is putting a premium on failure—a bounty on bad management. I do not believe that the farmers in those States want that done. I ask the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SHIPSTEAD] or the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. LADD] if that is not the way the bill would operate if it became a law. If a man has no credit whatever, if he has been foreclosed and is really in distress, he can not get a penny out of it, neither can solvent farmers whose methods have been conservative.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Connecticut has expired.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD addressed the Senate in continuation of his speech of yesterday. His entire speech is as follows:

Wednesday, March 12, 1924.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, I said the other day, and I want to repeat it this afternoon, that I am going to vote for this bill; but I hope the Senate will not consider that I believe this a complete or real relief for the agricultural situation in the Northwest. I had not intended to discuss this bill further, but Senators who have discussed it have drifted away upon the billows of imagination in so many various directions, upon the waves of speculation, that I want to make a few remarks in order to attract the attention of the constitutional lawyers of the Senate, who seem to be laboring under the misapprehension that this is the first time in American history that the Federal Government has loaned funds out of its Treasury to private individuals.

Some one has said that "you can find justice anywhere except in the office of a lawyer, and that you can find religion anywhere except in a theological seminary." I have noticed that constitutional lawyers spend most of their time splitting fine constitutional hairs, which are so fine that they are invisible to the ordinary individual who is not a constitutional lawyer. They seem to think that the United States, with its 110,000,000 people, hang suspended in the air on some invisible constitutional hairs, and if these fine strands of hair are broken by any ordinary citizen the United States and its people will fall into oblivion.

I want to point out this afternoon some figures in addition to what I read into the RECORD the other day, showing that it is no innovation on the part of the Government to loan funds out of the Treasury to private individuals. But before I do that I want to call attention to a remark of the Senator from Maryland [Mr. BRUCE], who said, I believe, that he saw a political issue, or a dangerous political precedent—I think he said "issue"—in this bill; that it was a political bill. I can conceive how, being inadequate as it is, it might be used by the administration as a kind of an ear of corn in an attempt to satisfy the farmers of the Northwest who were dispossessed of their property through machinery provided by Congress, and power given to the Federal reserve banking system, which power they used to deflate the assets of the farmers of America to the amount of $32,000,000,000. I quote these figures from the Manufacturers' Record, of Baltimore, a very conservative paper, and therefore very respectable, and, of course, I hope that every Senator will take it as being accurate when I say this periodical is both conservative and respectable.

The power was given to the Federal reserve banking system, and to those who control it, to dispossess the American farmer of that amount of property. We are not here asking charity. I will not say that by this bill we are even asking to receive back a little of what has been taken away from us, but I want to serve notice right here that if it is the intention of the administration to use this bill as a political issue and go before the farmers of the Northwest in the coming campaign and say that "we have given you relief," they are going to fail if that is the purpose of this legislation. They will have to give us a real agricultural bill if they expect to do that. This makeshift will not do.

We in the Northwest have had the experience in past years of having slogans and camouflage legislation enacted for us in order to lead the American people to the polls that we might vote in the way special privilege wanted us to vote. When I think how, election after election, they have done that I am always reminded of a neighbor on our farm when I was a little boy. He drove a yoke of oxen, and those oxen were not very well trained. They never would start when he wanted them to start, and they never would stop when he wanted them to stop. So, in order to enable him to make them go he carried an ear of corn. Whenever he wanted them to start he would take the ear of corn out and dangle it in front of their faces. Then that yoke of oxen would start and move. Then he would go in the direction he wanted them to go, dangling that ear of corn before them. When he came to the place where he wanted them to stop he would put that ear of corn in his pocket, and that yoke of oxen never got the corn.

I am always reminded of that ear of corn and that farmer when I see how in political campaigns politicians representing special privilege go out and try to lead the American people to the polls. They may try to do that with this bill, if it is passed, but I am saying that it can not be done. It can not be used for that purpose, because we have been led too often in that way. Always before a campaign some kind of legislation is passed in order to satisfy and mollify the people, and then before election politicians will go out with their ear of corn in their pockets, and about two or three weeks before election they hold that ear of corn out before the people's faces. Sometimes they call it one thing, sometimes they call it another; but it makes no difference what they call it, because it is always the same old ear of corn. Sometimes they call it a "full dinner pail." Sometimes they call it "normalcy" and "prosperity." Sometimes they call it "He kept us out of war." Sometimes they call it "Look out for the radicals in the United States Senate." It makes no difference what they call it; it is always the same old ear of corn.

It may be true that this is intended to be used as an ear of corn in the coming campaign, but I want to assure Senators that it is going to take more than an ear of corn to get the people to vote with you this time. We want a bill that will give the farmers a fair price for their products. They can not borrow themselves out of debt. They must have a price above the cost of production.

I want to call the attenton of the Senate to a statement I have from the Secretary of the Treasury showing what obligations of private corporations and foreign Governments are held by the Federal Government; and as I read these items—the stupendous figures showing the immense amount of money the Government has loaned to private individuals—the natural query will come to my mind, Where were these constitutional lawyers when these vast sums of money were taken out of the Treasury and given to private corporations and private individuals?

This is a statement issued by the Secretary of the Treasury showing securities owned by the United States December 31, 1923. It gives a statement of the bonds of foreign Governments received pursuant to agreement for funding of their debts to the United States pursuant to the act of Congress approved February 9, 1922, as amended by act approved February 28, 1923: Great Britain, $4,577,000,000. Under acts of April 24, 1917, and September 14, 1917: Belgium, Czechoslovakia, France, Greece, Italy, Liberia, Rumania, Russia, and Serbia, a total of $5,242,459,555, making a grand total of over $9,800,000,000. This is only one-third of what was taken from the American farmers.

Then comes an item of foreign obligations received from the Secretary of War on account of the sale of surplus war supplies, $592,549,332.24. Then we have another item, foreign obligations received from the Secretary of the Navy on account of the sale of surplus war supplies, $2,538,065.03. Another item is foreign obligations received from the United States Grain Corporation on account of final liquidation, given for relief pursuant to act approved March 30, 1922, $56,858,802.49, and another item, "foreign obligations received from the American Relief Association on account of relief pursuant to act approved February 25, 1919," $84,048,963.55.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's time has expired on the pending amendment. He has 10 minutes on the bill.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I thank the Chair. Another item is capital stock of War Emergency Corporation, $18,042,683.15. Then there is capital stock of the Hoboken Manufacturers' Railroad, $400,000; capital stock of the United States Housing Corporation issued, $47,612,835.29; capital stock of the United States Sugar Equalization Board, $5,000,000; capital stock of the United States Spruce Production Co., $7,018,499.25; capital stock of the War Finance Corporation, $37,869,657.06.

Then we have the obligations of carriers acquired under section 7 of the Federal control act, approved March 21, 1918, as amended, to the Boston & Maine Railroad and Washington, Brandywine & Point Lookout Railway, $26,056,000, and then we have some other items of various other railroad companies. I shall only read the totals of the various items that have been loaned by the Government to the various railroad companies. Here is an item of $36,181,000; another of $233,670,000; another of $191,380,000; another of $7,000,000; making a grand total of loans to railroads of over $394,000,000.

Now, that is money that has been loaned to foreign governments and to private corporations out of the Treasury of the United States.

Director General Davis's report of January 4, 1924, shows that the railroads were paid for the 26 months of war-time control and the six months' guaranty period under the transportation act the sum of $1,696,000,000. This afternoon I pick up the afternoon paper and discover in great headlines that J. Pierpont Morgan & Co. has just loaned $50,000,000 to the French Government. I want to direct your attention to the fact that the French Government already owes the United States Government and therefore the people of the United States several billion dollars, which her leading statesmen have said they do not intend to pay. Last spring when France went into the Ruhr I had the suspicion that she had the secret backing of the financiers of the United States. I want to direct attention to the fact that J. Pierpont Morgan has just loaned $50,000,000 to the Poincaré government of France, and that we found in the papers of Mr. Page, who was ambassador to Great Britain during the World War, when his private letters were revealed by Mr. Burton Hendrick—and they will be found in the World's Work for August or September, 1922—the very astonishing information that when we went into the World War the British Government had overdrawn its bank account with J. Pierpont Morgan to the amount of $400,000,000 and did not have the money to make good that overdraft. According to the same letters of Mr. Page, who ought to know, we get the information, in the same periodical for August or September, 1922, that a few days after we went into the war that amount of money was taken out of the Federal Treasury and deposited in the bank of J. Pierpont Morgan.

If the "American flag follows the American dollar," it would be interesting to know what that overdraft in the bank of J. Pierpont Morgan had to do with the desire that became so prevalent here to enter the World War for liberty and democracy. It would also be interesting to know whether this new loan of $50,000,000 by J. Pierpont Morgan to the French imperial government of Poincaré will be used in dragging us into another war to save the world for democracy and Poincaré. We are asking donations from the American people to help feed the starving women and children of Germany. At the same time Morgan & Co. loan money to Poincaré's government so they can keep up the war and starve these women and children.

The items I have read run into the billions of dollars, and the money of the American people is shoveled out of the country to support a Government that is again threatening the peace of the world. While they are doing that we are sitting here in the Senate bartering and dickering like pawnbrokers over a miserable little $50,000,000 to loan to the impoverished agriculturists of the Northwest. I would like to know where the constitutional lawyers with their fine hairsplitting have been while all these American dollars that have been wrung out of the labor of the American people have been shoveled out to support the imperial governments of Europe in their struggle for supremacy in order that they may determine who shall control the destinies of the world and who shall collect the taxes in order that they may have interest on their war bonds?

Thursday, March 13, 1924.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, in addressing the Senate yesterday afternoon I was reading some statistics from a statement given out by the Secretary of the Treasury, and while reading that statement it was called to my attention by the Chair that my time limit of 10 minutes had expired. I therefore take advantage of this opportunity to ask unanimous consent that the remainder of the statement of the Secretary of the Treasury be printed in the RECORD with my remarks of yesterday in order that the complete statement shall be available to Senators. It is a short statement, but very complete. I ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, I want to say just a word in reply to the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN] regarding the letter from Minnesota. I also have received some letters from Minnesota from farmers who object to the bill because they consider that it is only a drop in the bucket so far as the agricultural situation is concerned. I have also received some letters objecting to it because it applies to one section of the country and does not take care of the agricultural situation of the South. I admit, and I have said from the very beginning, that I do not consider it a perfect bill. I said in the beginning that I consider it like giving half a cooky to a man who has had nothing to eat for two weeks.

But this is the first agricultural relief bill brought before the Senate, and while I have been told that it has been advanced in order to stop a real agricultural relief bill, I can not believe that. I think it will do some farmers some good. The Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, who held extended hearings on the bill, reported it out as a bill that would render some relief, and while it may not be as perfect as we expect to get later, at least I feel there is some relief in the measure, and therefore I am going to vote for it.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, I feel it my duty to state in the five minutes allotted to me under the unanimous-consent agreement the reasons why I shall vote against the bill.

I believe our Government was organized for three prime purposes—to provide for the common defense, to define the rights between its citizens, each to one another, and for the preservation of order within our boundaries. I believe that the centralization of power which has resulted from our wars, and particularly the last war, has brought a great element of danger, in that every person who has a fad or a pet reform or some moral idea that he wants to impress on the community now comes to the National Congress to put it through either by constitutional amendment or otherwise.

I believe that a similar danger has grown up through the exercise of the vast taxing powers of this Government and the accumulation here in the National Treasury of a huge public fund. Of course, the purpose for which taxes are levied and the purpose for which that fund is raised is to carry on the primary purposes of government, and those do not include the use of the Government as a crutch for the benefit of every group of our citizens who have not that degree of prosperity which they want and who wish to lean on the Government. No such function properly belongs to our National Government; and yet the public fund which we have raised by taxation upon all citizens stands here as a target of every organized minority which chooses to make a raid on it and to demand a hand-out.

The great group of taxpayers is unorganized and can not defend itself. The people who have to pay the bill have no organization which can put up their side of the case to us, but we are the trustees of their money, and the burden is upon us to provide that defense for them against these raids. As trustees of the public money, I believe that we should refuse to allow it to be used for purposes that are nothing more nor less than charities. I believe that it is an unconstitutional application of the public money of which we are trustees for us to appropriate as we did $20,000,000 to Russia; as we are now asked to do in giving some more millions to Germany for the relief of her citizens; as we are asked to do in a half dozen bills for the relief of particular depressed industries in the United States. This Government was not created for the purpose of being a great charitable organization with the power of levying compulsory contributions to its Treasury. I do not believe that taxes are collected for that purpose; I do not believe the money is ours to spend for that purpose. For that reason, I expect to vote against the pending bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is upon the amendment in the nature of a substitute proposed by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HOWELL].

Mr. KING. I discussed at some length the bill before us a day or two ago and take the floor now to put into the RECORD a few figures relating to North Dakota. When I showed in my speech that South Dakota had diversified crops and was reasonably prosperous, the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. JOHNSON] stated that the bill did not apply to that State. The Senator from Idaho [Mr. GOODING] stated that the testimony before the committee reporting the bill showed that it would not apply to all parts of North Dakota. The figures furnished by the Comptroller of the Currency, the Agricultural Department, and various State agencies conclusively demonstrate that the conditions in North Dakota are not as deplorable and precarious as some would have us believe. Indeed, a comparison between that State and other sections of the United States will reveal that the problems of the people of North Dakota are not more serious or difficult than those in some other States.

The following table, furnished by the Department of Agriculture, which I ask leave to insert without reading, shows that in 1923 there were 8,000 mules, 566,000 hogs, 240,000 sheep, 797,000 horses, 503,000 milch cows, and 814,000 other cattle. It also shows that the automobiles on the farms in the State in 1920 were 47,711, and the total number in the State in 1923 was 109,266.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The table referred to is as follows:

Mr. KING. This table shows an increase of 30,000 cows during the year 1923. I submitted figures a few days ago showing that there was an average of more than six milk cows for each farm in North Dakota.

The Comptroller of the Currency reports that the deposits of the banks reporting to his office as of June 30, 1923, amounted to $167,284,000. In 1915 the aggregate deposits of the banks of North Dakota were only $89,422,000. These figures show a remarkable increase in bank deposits between 1915 and 1923.

The State commissioner of agriculture and labor reports to the Governor of North Dakota under date of August 31, 1922, that there "has been a practical development of dairy cattle, beef cattle, poultry, and a larger acreage of cultivated crops, such as potatoes, corn, and so forth, during the past three years, and that many acres have been reduced to pastures and hay meadows." He refers to the forage and hay crops "which have come into prominence, among them being the two legumes, alfalfa and sweet clover, Sudan grass, kafir corn, sorghum, fodder corn, and sunflower." He also adds that the interest taken in these crops "shows a marked disposition toward an increase of dairy and beef cattle."

The report of the dairy commissioner states that the condition with respect to dairying has changed; "that dairying is an approved activity"; and that there has been a "period of herd improvement, of the introduction of purebred foundation herds, of observation, and application of better and more economical dairy methods." He also adds that the manufacture of dairy products has passed from "the primary stages into highly organized activities involving organization and capital." He also states that there has been a gain in the amount of butterfat marketed through cream stations for the year ending June 30, 1922, over 1921 of 30.6 per cent. The report of the commissioner of agriculture and labor further shows a great variety of agricultural products for 1920. Since then the number of varieties has increased, as well as the production. In 1920 there were seven and one-half million acres of wheat (spring, Durham, and winter) harvested, and the number of acres of oats, flax, barley, rye, corn, and other important crops harvested amounted to approximately 5,000,000. In addition, many thousands of acres produced hay and various fodder crops, and the area cultivated for vegetables and smaller crops was not inconsiderable.

The following table from the census returns for 1920 shows the acreage of important crops in North Dakota for 1919, 1909, and 1899. I ask that it be inserted into the RECORD without reading.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The table referred to is as follows:

Acreage of important crops.

Crop.	1919	1909	1899
Corn	191,423	185,122	62,373
Oats	2,073,162	2,147,032	780,517
Wheat	9,098,042	8,188,782	4,451,251
Barley	1,085,329	1,215,811	287,093
Rye	2,422,563	48,188	27,995
Flaxseed	649,949	1,068,049	773,999
Hay and forage	[1] 4,035,803	2,864,244	1,410,534
Potatoes	82,561	54,067	21,936

[1] Includes 278,455 acres in corn cut for forage. This crop was not included to any extent in the hay and forage totals prior to 1919.

Mr. KING. Other crops were raised, the acreage of which was considerable. The above figures show that as early as 1899 nearly a million and a half acres were devoted to hay and forage as against 4,451,000 devoted to wheat. In 1909 the wheat acreage was more than 8,000,000, and at the peak, when it is claimed there had been a great increase in wheat production at the request of the Government, the acreage was but slightly over 9,000,000. A greater proportion of increase in the wheat acreage, between 1909 and 1919, can be found in a number of States. These figures, and others which I might submit, negative the contention of the proponents of this bill that North Dakota is in need of this legislation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Utah has expired.

The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HOWELL].

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President, I will inquire if I have occupied 10 minutes or 5 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the unanimous agreement entered into on yesterday the time limit on debate is five minutes after 1 o'clock to-day.

Mr. McLEAN. Five minutes on the amendments?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Five minutes on each amendment and five minutes on the bill itself.

Mr. McLEAN. I spoke, I think, only five minutes, and so I have five minutes left on the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has five minutes on the bill.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President, I do not think I shall occupy five minutes; but the Senator from Utah has presented to the Senate some very interesting statistics. With regard to dairying, and especially with regard to the production and marketing of milk, I wish to call attention to the fact that the situation in North Dakota is no more serious than it is in New England. A meeting of the Dairymen's Association of New England was held in Boston last week. The dairymen are well organized and have their cooperative selling organizations; they have had years of experience; but they are now selling milk that costs them 8½ cents a quart for 6½ cents. So the farmer who goes into the dairy business at this time in a commercial way is bound to find a glutted market. The man who invested $20,000 in the dairy industry in New England to-day will lose his money in five years, unless there is a decided improvement in the market.

Mr. STEPHENS. Mr. President, the pending bill has been discussed for several days, and every angle of the question has been presented to the Senate. I rise merely in order that I may state in a brief way my disapproval of this class of legislation.

In the first place, I am going to say, Mr. President, that the admissions of the advocates of this bill condemn the measure. Some Senators say that it is only a makeshift; that it does not meet the situation and give the relief to which the farmers of the Northwest are entitled. In my opinion, we should not indulge in legislative makeshifts.

Again, it is admitted by those who advocate this bill that it does not proceed upon sound business principles. When on yesterday the amendment of the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] was voted down, by that very vote there was an admission that those who favor this bill do not intend that its provisions shall be administered in a businesslike way.

Furthermore, Mr. President, it occurs to me that those who advocate the bill are rather inconsistent in their arguments. During this discussion I have heard Senator after Senator condemn the Esch-Cummins law, and yet they hold it up as a precedent. They say that the provisions of that law were wrong, that it should not have been enacted; and yet they ask the Senate to proceed along the same line, following what they condemn as a bad precedent. I wish to say in that connection that I happened to be a Member of the House of Representatives when that bill was passed, and at that time I opposed it, spoke against it, and voted against it; but my question is this: Why condem a thing and then hold it up as a precedent that we should follow in this particular matter? Of course it is an old saying that two wrongs never make a right. Although the Congress time after time may have violated constitutional provisions and done things that should not have been done, yet that is no reason why in this instance we should violate the Constitution.

To my mind, Mr. President, a more absurd or ridiculous proposition was never advanced in a legislative body than this one. The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HOWELL] said a moment ago that he would not favor this legislation as a general principle, and he went on to say that his reason for favoring it now was that prosperity had not been equalized among the industries of the Nation. If that shall be the rule to be adopted by us as legislators, it will mean that we must be constantly making a survey of the Nation to find out where people are not prosperous, where they have been unfortunate——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CURTIS in the chair.) The Senator's time is up on the amendment, but he has five minutes on the bill.

Mr. STEPHENS. Very well.

I was saying, Mr. President, that if we shall adopt that as our rule of procedure with reference to matters of this kind, we must make a general survey and find out where the unfortunate are, and endeavor to relieve their situation. As has been so well said by the Senator from Pennsylvania, that is not the province of this Government. We have no right to turn the Nation into a charitable institution. If the idea that has been advanced in this discussion is to be followed, the thing for us to do is to announce that the Treasury of the Nation is open to the unfortunate, that we intend to create a great bureau of the Government whose duty it shall be to search out the unfortunate, to relieve their distress, and to provide by appropriate legislation a large revolving fund in order that this distress may be relieved wherever found.

As I said, Mr. President, this appears to me to be an absurd, a ridiculous proposition. Some Senator the other day seemed to be a little incensed because it was charged that this is a gift. I want to say that there can be no doubt that it will in most instances, at least, if not in all, be a gift if it is to be administered as provided by this bill. It is not to relieve the man who is entitled to credit they admit. It is not to be used to relieve the man who can give any assurance whatever that the money he shall receive shall ever be returned into the Treasury of the Government; but the Senator from Nebraska proposes that we shall go into the business of buying livestock and selling them on the installment plan, and he argues that he engaged in that kind of business for a long time with very little loss, but I am sure, from what he said, that the security was entirely different from that offered here.

Why, Mr. President, if chickens, hogs, and livestock are to be purchased and turned over without any additional security, the Senator would have this great Nation not only converted into an installment-plan business but he would have hundreds and perhaps thousands—hundreds, at least—of inspectors, men whose duty it would be to go out over the Nation, over those sections of the country where these loans were made and make periodic inspections of the condition of the chickens, of the hogs, of the sheep, and of the cattle. That is an entirely unworkable proposition, as I see it.

Ah, but the Senator says we lost but little. Mr. President, it is not the duty of the Government to do anything for those who happen to be in distress where there is any chance whatever of loss. As has been suggested, we are the trustees of the taxpayers of the Nation, and I submit that there is not a Senator on this floor who would deal with his own money as we are asked to deal with the money of the taxpayers of this Nation. We have the right to deal with our own money as we please, to give it away or to make loans with little or no security; but we have no right to tax the people of the country, and then use the tax money in any such manner as is proposed by this bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Mississippi has expired. The question is on the amendment, in the nature of a substitute, offered by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HOWELL].

The amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no further amendment to be proposed as in Committee of the Whole, the bill will be reported to the Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Edwards	Kendrick	Reed, Pa.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Sixty-eight Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The question is on concurring in the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, in the amendment offered by myself, and which was adopted as in Committee of the Whole, I move to substitute the word "shall" for "may."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole will be stated.

The READING CLERK. On page 4, line 10, after the word "livestock," in line 2 of the amendment heretofore agreed to, it is proposed to strike out the word "may" and insert the word "shall," so as to make the amendment read:

> The Secretary, in executing the functions vested in him by this act, shall, so far as practicable, utilize the Federal intermediate credit banks system; and the Federal Farm Loan Board and the directors and officers of the Federal intermediate credit banks shall cooperate with the Secretary for such purpose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Montana to the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. On that I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the reading clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BRANDEGEE (when his name was called). I am paired on this bill and all amendments with the senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] and vote "yea."

Mr. LODGE (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], which I transfer to the senior Senator from Vermont [Mr. GREENE], and vote "nay."

Mr. PHIPPS (when his name was called). Announcing my pair with the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. DIAL], I withhold my vote.

Mr. SMITH (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts (when his name was called). On this question I have a pair with the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT], which I transfer to the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY], and vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. GERRY. I desire to announce that the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY] is necessarily absent.

Mr. McCORMICK. I have a standing pair with the senior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN]. He is not present, and I withhold my vote.

The result was announced—yeas 34, nays 36, as follows:

So the Senate refused to agree to the amendment to the amendment made as in the Committee of the Whole.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on concurring in the amendments made as in the Committee of the Whole.

The amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

Mr. KING and others demanded the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

The reading clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BRANDEGEE (when his name was called). Announcing again my pair with the senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN], I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], and vote "nay."

Mr. LADD (when the name of Mr. JOHNSON of California was called). The senior Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] is paired with the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS]. The Senator from California desires that I announce that if present he would vote "yea." The senior Senator from West Virginia if present would vote "nay."

Mr. JONES of New Mexico (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Maine [Mr. FERNALD]. I am unable to obtain a transfer of the pair, and withhold my vote. If I were permitted to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. LADD (when Mr. LENROOT's name was called). I am requested by the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] to announce that if he were present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. LODGE (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Vermont [Mr. GREENE], and vote "nay."

Mr. PHIPPS (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. DIAL]. I am informed that if he were present he would vote as I intend to vote, and therefore I am at liberty to vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. SMITH (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING]. In his absence, I withhold my vote.

Mr. LADD (when Mr. STERLING's name was called). The senior Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING] is paired with the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], as has been announced. If the senior Senator from South Dakota were present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts (when his name was called). On this question I am paired with the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. DIAL] and vote "nay."

Mr. LADD (when Mr. WELLER's name was called). I was requested to announce that the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. WELLER] is paired with the junior Senator from South Dakota [Mr. NORBECK]. If present, the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. NORBECK] would vote "yea" and the Senator from Maryland [Mr. WELLER] would vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. McCORMICK. I have a standing pair with the senior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. GERRY. I desire to announce that the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY] is necessarily absent. I also wish to announce that the junior Senator from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] is necessarily absent. If present, he would vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 32, nays 41, as follows:

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the unanimous-consent agreement the Senate will proceed to the consideration of Senate Joint Resolution 22.

Mr. NORRIS. No; Mr. President, under the unanimous-consent agreement the joint resolution will not come up until to-morrow at 2 o'clock. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the calendar under Rule VIII and that we begin at the point where we left off when the calendar was last called.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, if the Senator will withhold the request for a moment——

Mr. NORRIS. Certainly.

Mr. LODGE. I gave notice that to-day on the conclusion of the morning business I should move that the Senate go into executive session to consider the treaty with Great Britain. I did not make the motion because the Senate met after a recess under a unanimous-consent agreement, and when the unfinished business was disposed of I did not wish to interfere with the joint resolution which is in charge of the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. I supposed the Senator had changed the notice.

Mr. LODGE. No; I have not changed it.

Mr. NORRIS. If the Senator wants an executive session, I will withdraw my request.

Mr. LODGE. I should like to make a motion that we go into executive session.

Mr. NORRIS. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The request submitted by the Senator from Nebraska is withdrawn. The Senator from Massachusetts is recognized.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. LODGE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 3 hours and 25 minutes spent in executive session, the doors were reopened.

The vote on ratification resulted—yeas 61, nays 7, not voting 28, as follows:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, January 24, 1924.

The PRESIDENT:

The undersigned, the Secretary of State, has the honor to lay before the President with a view to its transmission to the Senate to receive the advice and consent of that body to ratification, if his judgement approve thereof, a treaty between the United States and Great Britain to aid in the prevention of the smuggling of intoxicating liquors into the United States.

Respectfully submitted.

CHARLES E. HUGHES.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, January 23, 1924.

The President of the United States of America;

And His Majesty the King of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland and of the British Dominions beyond the Seas, Emperor of India;

Being desirous of avoiding any difficulties which might arise between them in connection with the laws in force in the United States on the subject of alcoholic beverages;

Have decided to conclude a convention for that purpose;

And have appointed their plenipotentiaries:

The President of the United States of America:

Charles Evans Hughes, Secretary of State of the United States;

His Majesty the King of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland and of the British Dominions beyond the Seas, Emperor of India:

The Right Hon. Sir Auckland Campbell Geddes, G. C. M. G., K. C. B., his ambassador extraordinary and plenipotentiary to the United States of America;

Who, having communicated their full powers found in good and due form, have agreed as follows:

ARTICLE I.

The high contracting parties declare that it is their firm intention to uphold the principle that 3 marine miles extending from the coastline outwards and measured from low-water mark constitute the proper limits of territorial waters.

ARTICLE II.

(1) His Britannic Majesty agrees that he will raise no objection to the boarding of private vessels under the British flag outside the limits of territorial waters by the authorities of the United States, its territories, or possessions in order that enquiries may be addressed to those on board and an examination be made of the ship's papers for the purpose of ascertaining whether the vessel or those on board are endeavoring to import or have imported alcoholic beverages into the United States, its territories, or possessions in violation of the laws there in force. When such enquiries and examination show a reasonable ground for suspicion, a search of the vessel may be initiated.

(2) If there is reasonable cause for belief that the vessel has committed or is committing or attempting to commit an offense against the laws of the United States, its territories, or possessions prohibiting the importation of alcoholic beverages, the vessel may be seized and taken into a port of the United States, its territories, or possessions for adjudication in accordance with such laws.

(3) The rights conferred by this article shall not be exercised at a greater distance from the coast of the United States, its territories, or possessions than can be traversed in one hour by the vessel suspected of endeavoring to commit the offense. In cases, however, in which the liquor is intended to be conveyed to the United States, its territories, or possessions by a vessel other than the one boarded and searched, it shall be the speed of such other vessel and not the speed of the vessel boarded which shall determine the distance from the coast at which the right under this article can be exercised.

ARTICLE III.

No penalty or forfeiture under the laws of the United States shall be applicable or attach to alcoholic liquors or to vessels or persons by reason of the carriage of such liquors, when such liquors are listed as sea stores or cargo destined for a port foreign to the United States, its territories, or possessions on board British vessels voyaging to or from ports of the United States, or its territories or possessions, or passing through the territorial waters thereof, and such carriage shall be as now provided by law with respect to the transit of such liquors through the Panama Canal, provided that such liquors shall be kept under seal continuously while the vessel on which they are carried remains within said territorial waters and that no part of such liquors shall at any time or place be unladen within the United States, its territories, or possessions.

ARTICLE IV.

Any claim by a British vessel for compensation on the grounds that it has suffered loss or injury through the improper or unreasonable exercise of the rights conferred by article 2 of this treaty or on the ground that it has not been given the benefit of article 3 shall be referred for the joint consideration of two persons, one of whom shall be nominated by each of the high contracting parties.

Effect shall be given to the recommendations contained in any such joint report. If no joint report can be agreed upon, the claim shall be referred to the claims commission established under the provisions of the agreement for the settlement of outstanding pecuniary claims signed at Washington the 18th August, 1910, but the claim shall not, before submission to the tribunal, require to be included in a schedule of claims confirmed in the manner therein provided.

ARTICLE V.

This treaty shall be subject to ratification and shall remain in force for a period of one year from the date of the exchange of ratifications.

Three months before the expiration of the said period of one year either of the high contracting parties may give notice of its desire to propose modifications in the terms of the treaty.

If such modifications have not been agreed upon before the expiration of the term of one year mentioned above, the treaty shall lapse.

If no notice is given on either side of the desire to propose modifications, the treaty shall remain in force for another year, and so on automatically, but subject always in respect of each such period of a year to the right on either side to propose as provided above three months before its expiration modifications in the treaty, and to the provision that if such modifications are not agreed upon before the close of the period of one year the treaty shall lapse.

ARTICLE VI.

In the event that either of the high contracting parties shall be prevented either by judicial decision or legislative action from giving full effect to the provisions of the present treaty the said treaty shall automatically lapse, and, on such lapse or whenever this treaty shall cease to be in force, each high contracting party shall enjoy all the rights which it would have possessed had this treaty not been concluded.

The present convention shall be duly ratified by the President of the United States of America, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate thereof, and by His Britannic Majesty; and the ratifications shall be exchanged at Washington as soon as possible.

In witness whereof the respective plenipotentiaries have signed the present convention in duplicate and have thereunto affixed their seals.

Done at the city of Washington this 23d day of January, in the year of our Lord 1924.

(April 30, 1923.)

Mr. Justice Van Devanter delivered the opinion of the court.

These are suits by steamship companies operating passenger ships between United States ports and foreign ports to enjoin threatened application to them and their ships of certain provisions of the national prohibition act. The defendants are officers of the United States charged with the act's enforcement. In the first 10 cases the plaintiffs are foreign corporations and their ships are of foreign registry, while in the remaining two the plaintiffs are domestic corporations and their ships are of United States registry. All the ships have long carried and now carry, as part of their sea stores, intoxicating liquors intended to be sold or dispensed to their passengers and crews at meals and otherwise for beverage purposes. Many of the passengers and crews are accustomed to using such beverages and insist that the ships carry and supply liquors for such purposes. By the laws of all the foreign ports at which the ships touch this is permitted, and by the laws of some it is required. The liquors are purchased for the ships and taken on board in the foreign ports and are sold or dispensed in the course of all voyages, whether from or to those ports.

The administrative instructions dealing with the subject have varied since the national prohibition act went into effect. December 11, 1919, the following instructions were issued (T. D. 38218):

> "All liquors which are prohibited importation, but which are properly listed as sea stores on vessels arriving in ports of the United States, should be placed under seal by the boarding officer and kept sealed during the entire time of the vessel's stay in port, no part thereof to be removed from under seal for use by the crew at meals or for any other purpose.
> "Excessive or surplus liquor stores are no longer dutiable, being prohibited importation, but are subject to seizure and forfeiture.
> "Liquors properly carried as sea stores may be returned to a foreign port on the vessel's changing from the foreign to the coasting trade, or may be transferred under supervision of the customs officers from a vessel in foreign trade, delayed in port for any cause, to another vessel belonging to the same line or owner."

January 27, 1920, the first paragraph of those instructions was changed (T. D. 38248) so as to read:

> "All liquors which are prohibited importation, but which are properly listed as sea stores on American vessels arriving in ports of the United States, should be placed under seal by the boarding officer and kept sealed during the entire time of the vessel's stay in port, no part thereof to be removed from under seal for use by the crew at meals or for any other purpose. All such liquors on foreign vessels should be sealed on arrival of the vessels in port, and such portions thereof released from seal as may be required from time to time for use by the officers and crew."

October 6, 1922, the Attorney General, in answer to an inquiry by the Secretary of the Treasury, gave an opinion to the effect that the national prohibition act, construed in connection with the eighteenth amendment to the Constitution, makes it unlawful (a) for any ship, whether domestic or foreign, to bring into territorial waters of the United States, or to carry while within such waters, intoxicating liquors intended for beverage purposes, whether as sea stores or cargo, and (b) for any domestic ship even when without those waters to carry such liquors for such purposes either as cargo or sea stores. The President thereupon directed the preparation, promulgation, and application of new instructions conforming to that construction of the act. Being advised of this and that under the new instructions the defendants would seize all liquors carried in contravention of the act as so construed and would proceed to subject the plaintiffs and their ships to penalties provided in the act, the plaintiffs brought these suits.

The hearings in the district court were on the bills or amended bills, motions to dismiss and answers, and there was a decree of dismissal on the merits in each suit. (284 Fed. 890; 285 Fed. 79.) Direct appeals under Judicial Code, section 238, bring the cases here.

While the construction and application of the national prohibition act is the ultimate matter in controversy, the act is so closely related to the eighteenth amendment, to enforce which it was enacted, that a right understanding of it involves an examination and interpretation of the amendment. The first section of the latter declares (40 Stat. 1050, 1941):

> "SECTION 1. After one year from the ratification of this article the manufacture, sale, or transportation of intoxicating liquors within, the importation thereof into, or the exportation thereof from the United States and all territory subject to the jurisdiction thereof for beverage purposes is hereby prohibited."

These words, if taken in their ordinary sense, are very plain. The articles proscribed are intoxicating liquors for beverage purposes. The acts prohibited in respect of them are manufacture, sale, and transportation within a designated field, importation into the same, and exportation therefrom. And the designated field is the United States and all territory subject to its jurisdiction. There is no controversy here as to what constitutes intoxicating liquors for beverage purposes; but opposing contentions are made respecting what is comprehended in the terms "transportation," "importation," and "territory."

Some of the contentions ascribe a technical meaning to the words "transportation" and "importation." We think they are to be taken in their ordinary sense, for it better comports with the object to be attained. In that sense transportation comprehends any real carrying about or from one place to another. It is not essential that the carrying be for hire, or by one for another; nor that it be incidental to a transfer of the possession or title. If one carries in his own conveyance for his own purposes it is transportation no less than when a public carrier at the instance of a consignor carries and delivers to a consignee for a stipulated charge. (See United States v. Simpson, 252 U. S. 465.) Importation, in a like sense, consists in bringing an article into a country from the outside. If there be an actual bringing in it is importation regardless of the mode in which it is effected. Entry through a customhouse is not of the essence of the act.

Various meanings are sought to be attributed to the term "territory" in the phrase "The United States and all territory subject to the jurisdiction thereof." We are of the opinion that it means the regional areas—of land and adjacent waters—over which the United States claims and exercises dominion and control as a sovereign power. The immediate context and the purport of the entire section show that the term is used in a physical and not a metaphorical sense—that it refers to areas or districts having fixity of location and recognized boundaries. (See United States v. Bevans, 3 Wheat. 336, 390.)

It now is settled in the United States and recognized elsewhere that the territory subject to its jurisdiction includes the land areas under its dominion and control, the ports, harbors, bays, and other inclosed arms of the sea along its coast and a marginal belt of the sea extending from the coast line outward a marine league, or 3 geographic miles. (Church v. Hubbart, 2 Cranch, 187, 234; The Ann, 1 Fed. Cas., p. 926; United States v. Smiley, 27 Fed. Cas., p. 1132; Manchester v. Massachusetts, 139 U. S. 240, 257–258; Louisiana v. Mississippi, 202 U. S. 1, 52; 1 Kent's Com., 12th ed., *29; 1 Moore International Law Digest, sec. 145; 1 Hyde International Law, secs. 141, 142, 154; Wilson International Law, 8th ed., sec. 54; Westlake International Law, 2d ed., p. 187, et seq; Wheaton International Law, 3d ed., secs. 185–189, 252.) This, we hold, is the territory which the amendment designates as its field of operation; and the designation is not of a part of this territory but of "all" of it.

The defendants contend that the amendment also covers domestic merchant ships outside the waters of the United States, whether on the high seas or in foreign waters. But it does not say so; and what it does say shows, as we have indicated, that it is confined to the physical territory of the United States. In support of their contention the defendants refer to the statement sometimes made that a merchant ship is a part of the territory of the country whose flag she flies. But this, as has been aptly observed, is a figure of speech, a metaphor. (Scharrenberg v. Dollar S. S. Co., 245 U. S. 122, 127; In re Ross, 140 U. S. 453, 464; 1 Moore International Law Digest, sec. 174; Westlake International Law, 2d ed., p. 264; Hall International Law, 7th ed. (Higgins), sec. 76; Manning Law of Nations (Amos), p. 276; Piggott Nationality, Pt. II, p. 13.) The jurisdiction which it is intended to describe arises out of the nationality of the ship, as established by her domicile, registry, and use of the flag, and partakes more of the characteristics of personal than of territorial sovereignty. (See The Hamilton, 207 U. S. 398, 403; American Banana Co. v. United Fruit Co., 213 U. S. 347, 355; 1 Oppenheim International Law, 3d ed., secs. 123–125, 128.) It is chiefly applicable to ships on the high seas, where there is no territorial sovereign; and as respects ships in foreign territorial waters it has little application beyond what is affirmatively or tacitly permitted by the local sovereign. (2 Moore International Law Digest, secs. 204, 205; Twiss Law of Nations, 2d ed., sec. 166; Woolsey International Law, 6th ed., sec. 58; 1 Oppenheim International Law, 3d ed., secs. 128, 146, 260.)

The defendants further contend that the amendment covers foreign merchant ships when within the territorial waters of the United States. Of course, if it were true that a ship is a part of the territory of the country whose flag she carries, the contention would fail. But, as that is a fiction, we think the contention is right.

A merchant ship of one country voluntarily entering the territorial limits of another subjects herself to the jurisdiction of the latter. The jurisdiction attaches in virtue of her presence, just as with other objects within those limits. During her stay she is entitled to the protection of the laws of that place and correlatively is bound to yield obedience to them. Of course, the local sovereign may out of considerations of public policy choose to forego the exertion of its jurisdiction or to exert the same in only a limited way, but this is a matter resting solely in its discretion. The rule, now generally recognized, is nowhere better stated than in The Exchange (7 Cranch, 116, 136, 144), where Chief Justice Marshall, speaking for this court, said:

> "The jurisdiction of the nation within its own territory is necessarily exclusive and absolute. It is susceptible of no limitation not imposed by itself. Any restriction upon it, deriving validity, from an external source, would imply a diminution of its sovereignty to the extent of the restriction, and an investment of that sovereignty to the same extent in that power which could impose such restriction.
> "All exceptions, therefore, to the full and complete power of a nation within its own territories must be traced up to the consent of the nation itself. They can flow from no other legitimate source.
> "When private individuals of one nation spread themselves through another as business or caprice may direct, mingling indiscriminately with the inhabitants of that other, or when merchant vessels enter for the purposes of trade, it would be obviously inconvenient and dangerous to society, and would subject the laws to continual infraction and the government to degradation if such individuals or merchants did not owe temporary and local allegiance, and were not amendable to the jurisdiction of the country. Nor can the foreign sovereign have any motive for wishing such exemption. His subjects thus passing into foreign countries are not employed by him, nor are they engaged in national pursuits. Consequently there are powerful motives for not exempting persons of this description from the jurisdiction of the country in which they are found, and no one motive for requiring it. The implied license, therefore, under which they enter can never be construed to grant such exemption."

That view has been reaffirmed and applied by this court on several occasions. (United States v. Diekelman, 92 U. S. 520, 525, 526; Wildenhus' case, 120 U. S. 1, 11; Nishimura Ekiu v. United States, 142 U. S. 651, 659; Knott v. Botany Mills, 179 U. S. 69, 74; Patterson v. Bark Eudora, 190 U. S. 169, 176, 178; Strathearn S. S. Co. v. Dillon, 252 U. S. 348, 355–356. And see Buttfield v. Stranahan, 192 U. S. 470, 492–493; Oceanic Steam Navigation Co. v. Stranahan, 214 U. S. 320, 324; Brolan v. United States, 236 U. S. 216, 218.) In the Patterson case the court added:

> "Indeed, the implied consent to permit them (foreign merchant ships) to enter our harbors may be withdrawn, and if this implied consent may be wholly withdrawn it may be extended upon such terms and conditions as the Government sees fit to impose."

In principle, therefore, it is settled that the amendment could be made to cover both domestic and foreign merchant ships when within the territorial waters of the United States. And we think it has been made to cover both when within those limits. It contains no exception of ships of either class and the terms in which it is couched indicate that none is intended. Such an exception would tend to embarrass its enforcement and to defeat the attainment of its obvious purpose and therefore can not reasonably be regarded as implied.

In itself the amendment does not prescribe any penalties, forfeitures, or mode of enforcement, but by its second section (the second section says, "the Congress and the several States shall have concurrent power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation." For its construction, see United States v. Lanza (December 11, 1922)) leaves these to legislative action.

With this understanding of the amendment, we turn to the national prohibition act, c. 83, 41 Stat. 305, which was enacted to enforce it. The act is a long one and most of its provisions have no real bearing here. Its scope and pervading purposes are fairly reflected by the following excerpts from Title II:

> "SEC. 3. No person (the act contains a provision (sec. 1 of Title II) showing that it uses the word 'persons' as including 'associations, copartnerships, and corporations' when the context does not indicate otherwise) shall, on or after the date when the eighteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States goes into effect, manufacture, sell, barter, transport, import, export, deliver, furnish, or possess any intoxicating liquor except as authorized in this act, and all the provisions of this act shall be liberally construed to the end that the use of intoxicating liquor as a beverage may be prevented. * * *
> "SEC. 21. Any room, house, building, boat, vehicle, structure, or place where intoxicating liquor is manufactured, sold, kept, or bartered in violation of this title, and all intoxicating liquor and property kept and used in maintaining the same, is hereby declared to be a common nuisance. * * *
> "SEC. 23. That any person who shall, with intent to effect a sale of liquor, by himself, his employee, servant, or agent, for himself or any person, company, or corporation, keep or carry around on his person, or in a vehicle, or other conveyance whatever, * * * any liquor * * * in violation of this title is guilty of a nuisance. * * *
> "SEC. 26. When the commissioner, his assistants, inspectors, or any officer of the law shall discover any person in the act of transporting, in violation of the law, intoxicating liquors in any wagon, buggy, automobile, water or air craft, or other vehicle, it shall be his duty to seize any and all intoxicating liquors found therein being transported contrary to law. * * *"

Other provisions show that various penalties and forfeitures are prescribed for violations of the act, and that the only instance in which the possession of intoxicating liquor for beverage purposes is recognized as lawful is where the liquor was obtained before the act went in effect and is kept in the owner's dwelling for use therein by him, his family, and his bona fide guests.

As originally enacted the act did not in terms define its territorial field, but a supplemental provision (sec. 3, act November 23, 1921, c. 134, 42 Stat. 222) afterwards enacted declares that it "shall apply not only to the United States but to all territory subject to its jurisdiction," which means that its field coincides with that of the eighteenth amendment. There is in the act no provision making it applicable to domestic merchant ships when outside the waters of the United States, nor any provision making it inapplicable to merchant ships, either domestic or foreign, when within those waters, save in the Panama Canal. There is a special provision dealing with the Canal Zone (the pertinent portion of section 20 of Title III, relating to the Canal Zone, is as follows:

> "SEC. 20. That it shall be unlawful to import or introduce into the Canal Zone, or to manufacture, sell, give away, dispose of, transport, or have in one's possession or under one's control within the Canal Zone, any alcoholic, fermented, brewed, distilled, vinous, malt, or spirituous liquors, except for sacramental, scientific, pharmaceutical, industrial, or medicinal purposes, under regulations to be made by the President, and any such liquors within the Canal Zone in violation hereof shall be forfeited to the United States and seized: Provided, That this section shall not apply to liquor in transit through the Panama Canal or on the Panama Railroad.") which excepts "liquor in transit through the Panama Canal or on the Panama Railroad." The exception does not discriminate between domestic and foreign ships, but applies to all liquor in transit through the canal, whether on domestic or foreign ships. Apart from this exception, the provision relating to the Canal Zone is broad and drastic like the others.

Much has been said at the bar and in the briefs about the Canal Zone exception, and various deductions are sought to be drawn from it respecting the applicability of the act elsewhere. Of course, the exception shows that Congress, for reasons appealing to its judgment, has refrained from attaching any penalty or forfeiture to the transportation of liquor while "in transit through the Panama Canal or on the Panama Railroad." Beyond this it has no bearing here, save as it serves to show that where in other provisions no exception is made in respect of merchant ships, either domestic or foreign, within the waters of the United States, none is intended.

Examining the act as a whole, we think it shows very plainly, first, that it is intended to be operative throughout the territorial limits of the United States, with the single exception stated in the Canal Zone provision; secondly, that it is not intended to apply to domestic vessels when outside the territorial waters of the United States; and thirdly, that it is intended to apply to all merchant vessels, whether foreign or domestic, when within those waters, save as the Panama Canal Zone exception provides otherwise.

In so saying we do not mean to imply that Congress is without power to regulate the conduct of domestic merchant ships when on the high seas, or to exert such control over them when in foreign waters as may be affirmatively or tacitly permitted by the territorial sovereign; for it long has been settled that Congress does have such power over them. (Lord v. Steamship Co., 102 U. S. 541; The Abby Dodge, 223 U. S. 166, 176.) But we do mean that the national prohibition act discloses that it is intended only to enforce the eighteenth amendment and limits its field of operation, like that of the amendment, to the territorial limits of the United States.

The plaintiffs invite attention to data showing the antiquity of the practice of carrying intoxicating liquors for beverage purposes as part of a ship's sea stores, the wide extent of the practice and its recognition in a congressional enactment, and argue therefrom that neither the amendment nor the act can have been intended to disturb that practice. But in this they fail to recognize that the avowed and obvious purpose of both the amendment and the act was to put an end to prior practices respecting such liquors, even though the practices had the sanction of antiquity, generality, and statutory recognition. Like data could be produced and like arguments advanced by many whose business, recognized as lawful theretofore, was shut down or curtailed by the change in national policy. In principle the plaintiffs' situation is not different from that of the innkeeper whose accustomed privilege of selling liquor to his guests is taken away, or that of the dining-car proprietor who is prevented from serving liquor to those who use the cars which he operates to and fro across our northern and southern boundaries.

It should be added that after the adoption of the amendment and the enactment of the national prohibition act, Congress distinctly withdrew the prior statutory recognition of liquors as legitimate sea stores. The recognition was embodied in section 2775 of the Revised Statutes, which was among the provisions dealing with customs administration, and when, by the act of September 21, 1922, those provisions were revised, that section was expressly repealed along with other provisions recognizing liquors as legitimate cargo. (Chapter 356, Title IV, and sec. 642, 42 Stat. 858, 948, 989.) Of course, as was observed by the district court, the prior recognition, although representing the national policy at the time, was not in the nature of a promise for the future.

It therefore is of no importance that the liquors in the plaintiffs' ships are carried only as sea stores. Being sea stores does not make them liquors any the less; nor does it change the incidents of their use as beverages. But it is of importance that they are carried through the territorial waters of the United States and brought into its ports and harbors. This is prohibited transportation and importation in the sense of the amendment and the act. The recent cases of Grogan v. Walker & Sons and Anchor Line v. Aldridge, 259 U. S. 80, are practically conclusive on the point. The question in one was whether carrying liquor intended as a beverage through the United States from Canada to Mexico was prohibited transportation under the amendment and the act, the liquor being carried in bond by rail, and that in the other was whether the transshipment of such liquor from one British ship to another in the harbor of New York was similarly prohibited, the liquor being in transit from Scotland to Bermuda. The cases were considered together and an affirmative answer was given in each, the court saying in the opinion, page 89:

> "The eighteenth amendment meant a great revolution in the policy of this country, and presumably and obviously meant to upset a good many things on as well as off the statute book. It did not confine itself in any meticulous way to the use of intoxicants in this country. It forbade export for beverage purposes elsewhere. True this discouraged production here, but that was forbidden already, and the provision applied to liquors already lawfully made. (See Hamilton v. Kentucky Distilleries & Warehouse Co., 251 U. S. 146, 151, n. 1.) It is obvious that those whose wishes and opinions were embodied in the amendment meant to stop the whole business. They did not want intoxicating liquor in the United States, and reasonably may have thought that if they let it in some of it was likely to stay. When, therefore, the amendment forbids not only importation into and exportation from the United States but transportation within it, the natural meaning of the words expresses an altogether probable intent. The prohibition act only fortifies in this respect the interpretation of the amendment itself. The manufacture, possession, sale, and transportation of spirits and wine for other than beverage purposes are provided for in the act, but there is no provision for transshipment or carriage across the country from without. When Congress was ready to permit such a transit for special reasons, in the Canal Zone, it permitted it in express words." (Title III, sec. 20, 41 Stat. 322.)

Our conclusion is that in the first 10 cases—those involving foreign ships—the decrees of dismissal were right and should be affirmed, and in the remaining two—those involving domestic ships—the decrees of dismissal were erroneous and should be reversed with directions to enter decrees refusing any relief as respects the operations of the ships within the territorial waters of the United States and awarding the relief sought as respects operations outside those waters.

[April 30, 1923.]

Mr. Justice Sutherland, dissenting.

I agree with the judgment of the court in so far as it affects domestic ships, but I am unable to accept the view that the eighteenth amendment applies to foreign ships coming into our ports under the circumsances here disclosed.

It would serve no useful purpose to give my reasons at any length for this conclusion. I therefore state them very generally and briefly.

The general rule of international law is that a foreign ship is so far identified with the country to which it belongs that its internal affairs, whose effect is confined to the ship, ordinarily are not subjected to interference at the hands of another State in whose ports it is temporarily present (2 Moore, Int. Law Dig., p. 292; United States v. Rodgers, 150 U. S. 249, 260; Wildenhus's Case, 120 U. S. 1, 12); and, as said by Chief Justice Marshall, in Murray v. Schooner Charming Betsy, 2 Cranch, 64, 118:

> "* * * an act of Congress ought never to be construed to violate the law of nations if any other possible construction remains. * * *."

That the Government has full power under the Volstead Act to prevent the landing or transshipment of any such liquors or their use in our ports is not doubted, and therefore it may provide for such assurances and safeguards as it may deem necessary to those ends. Nor do I doubt the power of Congress to do all that the court now holds has been done by that act, but such power exists not under the eighteenth amendment, to whose provisions the act is confined, but by virtue of other provisions of the Constitution, which Congress here has not attempted to exercise. With great deference to the contrary conclusion of the court, due regard for the principles of international comity which exist between friendly nations, in my opinion, forbids the construction of the eighteenth amendment and of the act which the present decision advances. Moreover, the eighteenth amendment, it must not be forgotten, confers concurrent power of enforcement upon the several States, and it follows that if the General Government possesses the power here claimed for it under that amendment, the several States within their respective boundaries possess the same power. It does not seem possible to me that Congress, in submitting the amendment or the several States in adopting it, could have intended to vest in the various seaboard States a power so intimately connected with our foreign relations and whose exercise might result in international confusion and embarrassment.

In adopting the eighteenth amendment and in enacting the Volstead Act the question of their application to foreign vessels in the circumstances now presented does not appear to have been in mind. If, upon consideration, Congress shall conclude that when such vessels in good faith, carrying liquor among their sea stores, come temporarily into our ports, their officers should, ipso facto, become liable to drastic punishment and the ships themselves subject to forfeiture, it will be a simple matter for that body to say so in plain terms. But interference with the purely internal affairs of a foreign ship is of so delicate a nature, so full of possibilities of international misunderstandings, and so likely to invite retaliation, that an affirmative conclusion in respect thereof should rest upon nothing less than the clearly expressed intention of Congress to that effect, and this I am unable to find in the legislation here under review.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, March 13, 1924.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Through the shades and silent rest Thou hast brought us, our blessed heavenly Father; therefore, we bless and praise Thy holy name! The touch of Thy love and mercy is as gentle as the morning light. Be with us that we may think clearly, feel deeply, and labor wisely, as the God of man desires. Moved by an irresistible devotion to country, keep us close to the feelings and needs of our fellow citizens. Teach us the best way to see, the best way to reason, the best way to act, and the best way to do our part in serving society and State. Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

ENROLLED BILL PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. ROSENBLOOM, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they had presented to the President of the United States for his approval the following bill:

H. R. 6901. An act to amend section 252 of the revenue act of 1921 in respect of credits and refunds.

INCREASE OF COAST GUARD FOR LAW ENFORCEMENT.

The SPEAKER. The unfinished business is the bill (H. R. 6815) to authorize a temporary increase of the Coast Guard for law amendment which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk reported the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, and was read the third time.

Mr. HILL of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, I make a motion to recommit the bill.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I also desire to make a motion to recommit the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman from Maryland opposed to the bill?

Mr. HILL of Maryland. I am.

Mr. BLANTON. I am also opposed to the bill.

The SPEAKER. Are either of the gentlemen members of the committee?

Mr. HILL of Maryland. Neither one of us, sir.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Maryland.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, may I suggest that the gentleman from Maryland is a member of the majority, from which side this bill comes, and I am on the minority side of the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Maryland. The Clerk will read the motion to recommit.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. HILL of Maryland offers the following motion to recommit the bill to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, with instructions to that committee to report the same back forthwith, with the following amendment: Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

"That the Secretary of the Navy is authorized to lend to the Department of the Treasury, for the use of the Coast Guard, such vessels of the Navy, with their outfits and armaments, as can be spared by the Navy, and as are adapted to the use of the Coast Guard, with the necessary officers and enlisted men of the Navy to handle the same for temporary needs."

Mr. BEGG. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that that motion is not in order, because it changes the bill entirely, and practically the same language was ruled out on a point of order in Committee of the Whole House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Maryland.

Mr. HILL of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, this is a bill which, according to its terms, would temporarily place at the disposition of the Coast Guard certain naval vessels and provide for the construction of certain other vessels and the employment of officers and men by the Coast Guard temporarily in order that the national prohibition enforcement act may be enforced as against alleged smuggling. The bill provides for an ultimate expenditure of $13,000,000 additional to the $10,000,000 already appropriated for the Coast Guard. My substitute provides for the lending to the Coast Guard by the Navy of ships, with their officers, men, and equipment, for the period of the temporary need, which will accomplish that purpose without any additional expense to the American people, and I respectfully submit it is in order.

The pending bill, to which I offer this substitute, would make possible the appropriation of nearly $24,000,000 for the Coast Guard for the coming year, nearly $2,000,000 more than the total cost of the whole United States Navy in 1890. The question here raised has nothing to do with the merits or demerits of prohibition or of the Volstead Act, and should be so considered and voted upon. This is not a question of "wet" or "dry." It presents merely a question of efficient and economical prevention of smuggling. My substitute will save $13,887,007.07 and stop smuggling, if anything will. I submit that my substitute is in order. The Navy was used to prevent the importation of slaves and for various other purposes cited by the Attorney General in the opinion I read here yesterday. If it is true that the Coast Guard can not handle the smuggling situation, let them have the aid of the existing Navy without the waste of nearly $14,000,000 needlessly to create a new Navy. I again suggest my substitute is in order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks, inasmuch as the gentleman's motion to recommit provides not only for the vessels of the Navy but also for the necessary officers and enlisted men of the Navy, that it is fairly subject to the point of order, and the Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I offer a motion to recommit, which was not held out of order yesterday.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas offers a motion to recommit, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. BLANTON moves to recommit this bill to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, with instructions to report the bill back to the House forthwith amended as follows: Strike out all of section 1 and insert in lieu thereof the following: "That the Secretary of the Navy is authorized to cooperate with the Department of the Treasury, by combining with the vessels in use of the Coast Guard such vessels of the Navy, with their officers and personnel, their outfits and armaments, as can be spared by the Navy and as are adapted to the use of the Coast Guard, to suppress smuggling into the United States," and strike out the balance of the bill.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I think that is subject to a point of order, and I make the point of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman on the point of order.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. The point of order is that it is not germane to the bill, in this respect: It seeks to turn over to the Coast Guard certain units of the Navy, together with their officers and enlisted personnel. The Speaker will observe that it does not state whether these officers and men shall be under the control of the Coast Guard or whether they shall retain their ratings as naval officers and enlisted men of the Navy.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, this proposed substitute of mine was not held out of order yesterday when this bill was debated in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. It was an amendment which was voted upon in the committee. It was so clearly in order that yesterday neither the chairman nor any other Member would make a point of order against it.

This bill is alleged to be designed to assist the President of the United States as chief executive officer of the Nation in enforcing the prohibition laws and in suppressing smuggling. It is to give him an added force in addition to the present Coast Guard force. I do not believe that it will stop smuggling, but will waste $15,000,000, and I offer a substitute that will stop smuggling and cost nothing extra. This amendment does not go beyond the scope of the bill. It merely provides that such of the boats of the Navy as are adaptable, with their whole equipment, shall cooperate with the Coast Guard in suppressing the liquor traffic, in suppressing the smuggling of liquor. This is in direct line with what the President of the United States wanted to do when he requested authority to use the Navy from the Attorney General, who held he did not have authority. This proposal of mine is to give him authority to use the Navy.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will confine himself to the point of order.

Mr. BLANTON. If the Speaker will inspect the preamble of the bill, he will see that it is to grant an additional force "to enforce the law." That is the main purpose; that is the big, broad purpose, "to enforce the law." This amendment comes within that general provision and within the broad provision stated in the preamble, to enforce the law.

The Chair will note there are various provisions in this bill which provide that various officers of the Navy and the enlisted personnel of the Navy may be loaned to this service and that they shall not lose their standing and their rating of priority in the Navy. In other words, when they are sent back to the Navy, either as reserve or regular officers, they shall retain their priority rights, and that is true as to the enlisted personnel. It deals, in many instances, with officers and the enlisted personnel of the Navy, and the priority of their rights is secured.

The bill is broad enough to take in an amendment of this kind. It is not a question of expediency; it is not a question of the merits of the amendment; it is a question to be voted up or down by the House. It is merely a question of germaneness, and I submit it is germane to the purposes of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the ruling made on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. HILL] applies exactly to this amendment providing that vessels of the Navy, with their officers and personnel, their outfits and armament, are to be transferred, and the Chair sustains the point of order.

CALL OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I think we ought to have a quorum present, and I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. What is the parliamentary situation with reference to the bill?

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CRAMTON. If there is a roll call at this time, would it be on the passage of the bill?

The SPEAKER. No; it would not.

Mr. CRAMTON. Then would not the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] prefer to withhold his point of order so we may have it on the passage of the bill? Will the gentleman not withhold his point of order?

Mr. BLANTON. If the gentleman wants to take up his conference report before the vote, I will withhold it.

Mr. CRAMTON. No.

Mr. BLANTON. We are going to require a quorum anyway.

Mr. CRAMTON. But let us have a vote on the passage of the bill instead of a useless roll call now.

Mr. BLANTON. I think it is better to have it now, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas makes the point of order there is no quorum present. It is clear there is not a quorum present.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

The Clerk called the roll, when the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The SPEAKER. Three hundred and fifty-four Members having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. WINSLOW. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. WINSLOW. Mr. Speaker, I call for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Speaker, I desire to vote "yea."

The SPEAKER. Was the gentleman present and listening when his name was called?

Mr. LITTLE. No.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman does not bring himself within the rule.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

On motion of Mr. MADDEN, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

CONGRESSIONAL ALLOTMENT OF PUBLIC DOCUMENTS.

Mr. KIESS. I call up from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. 7039) to amend section 72 of chapter 23, printing act approved June 12, 1895, with a Senate amendment and move the adoption of the Senate amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania calls up a House bill with a Senate amendment. The Clerk will report the Senate amendment.

The Senate amendment was read.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the Senate amendment.

The Senate amendment was agreed to.

INTERIOR DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the bill (H. R. 5078) making appropriations for the Department of the Interior for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1925, and for other purposes.

The report of the conferees has been adopted and the pending amendments have all been disposed of except as to two groups.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan calls up the conference report on the bill H. R. 5078, the Interior Department appropriation bill.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, the report of the conferees has been adopted and the pending amendments have all been disposed of except as to two groups. The first group of amendments, 15 to 19, inclusive, have to do with the amount to be appropriated for construction and maintenance and operation of certain Indian irrigation projects in Montana. The second group have to do with the appropriation for maintenance of Howard University.

Mr. SNYDER. Will the gentleman yield? I would like to ask the gentleman a question with reference to the irrigation projects.

Mr. CRAMTON. Will the gentleman defer his request a moment? There will be some discussion of that.

Mr. Speaker, I ask that the first group of amendments may be considered en bloc—amendments 15 to 19—having to do with the Montana Indian irrigation projects.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAMTON. Yes.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Do I understand that they are the amendments having to do with Indian irrigation projects?

Mr. CRAMTON. Yes; and I ask that they may be considered together, and if the permission is granted I will make one motion to cover them all.

Mr. BLANTON. They are all in Montana?

Mr. CRAMTON. Yes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent that the amendments referred to may be considered en bloc. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CRAMTON. I move, then, Mr. Speaker, that the House insist upon its disagreement to those amendments, and I will first yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNYDER] to answer an inquiry.

Mr. SNYDER. I want to ask the gentleman if in the preparation of this bill consideration has been given to the law which provides for the payment for the use of water and whether or not that law has been enforced by the bureau and whether this appropriation is being made within that act.

Mr. CRAMTON. I am frank to say to the gentleman from New York, who is chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs and better versed than I am in these matters, that I am not thoroughly familiar myself with the act in question, but independent of any act, just basing our action upon common sense and square dealing for the Treasury, the subcommittee went into that question somewhat to ascertain whether the cost of operation and maintenance of lands in these Indian irrigation projects, and particularly as to the land that is in white ownership or operated by white lessees, whether the cost of operation and maintenance is properly paid back by the white owners and white lessees, and I was not satisfied that that was the case. We started our investigation and I think we made it plain that when they come before us next year we are going to want to know definitely and positively about those matters. I am frank to say that this year neither the Reclamation Service nor the Indian Service was in a position to give us the kind of information that the House ought to have on this question, and if the gentleman will bear with us, we think when we come in next year we will have the information.

Mr. SNYDER. Of course, I want the House to know that four years ago, I think, we put into the Indian appropriation act language something like this: "That no part of the money appropriated in this act shall be expended upon this particular project or any Indian project unless the users of the water have made a definite arrangement for payment for such use," due to the fact that after an investigation of the Indian Affairs we discovered that more than $20,000,000 had been invested as a capital investment in these irrigation schemes. Sufficient money has not come back from that to pay the upkeep and operation of these plants, and we find also that the Indians and the whites did not know that under the reimbursable proposition under which the appropriations were made they were eventually to make those payments. Therefore, we fixed the laws that no more appropriations could be made unless these users of the water, white or Indian, had made an agreement that at some time, at least, they would pay for the use of it. I am asking whether that has been carried out.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I am very glad the gentleman has called that provision to my attention, and I hope through his action it will come to the attention of the Indian Bureau. Some further discussion of this phase will develop, I think, in the limited debate that we may have on this question.

Mr. SNYDER. I want to make one further observation for information. It was believed by the committee that made this investigation that, having invested $20,000,000 in these various Indian irrigation schemes, the income from that ought to be sufficient to at least maintain and upkeep the plants and provide such money as might be needed for the further extension of the plants.

Mr. CRAMTON. There is a very amazing situation in Montana in reference to this, which will interest the gentleman. I understand the gentleman from Montana [Mr. EVANS] desires to debate this matter. In view of the fact that the deficiency appropriation bill is urgently waiting action, I do not plan an extended debate, but will be glad to yield to the gentleman from Montana.

Mr. EVANS of Montana. Mr. Speaker, I want recognition in my own right.

Mr. CRAMTON. But I have not yielded the floor to the gentleman from Montana for any purpose.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is a preferential motion which the gentleman from Montana may make.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order. The gentleman from Michigan has the floor.

Mr. EVANS of Montana. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House recede and concur.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize the gentleman for that purpose.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, that was the point of order that I made.

Mr. CRAMTON. That does not carry with it the privilege of the floor for debate.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan has the floor, and the gentleman from Montana reserves the right to make that motion.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Montana for five minutes.

Mr. EVANS of Montana. Mr. Speaker, this is an irrigation project on land that was originally in the Flathead Indian Reservation. About 20 years or so ago the Congress decided to open that reservation and to reclaim a lot of the lands that were irrigable. It had the necessary surveys made and the estimates made and ascertained that it would take between six and seven million dollars to reclaim the land. They have from year to year appropriated on an average of $250,000 or $300,000, covering the period of some 12 or 14 years, and have now an investment out there of about $5,000,000. They have reclaimed a considerable portion of the land. They have built large canals to carry the water that runs down the mountain side, and then there came a criticism from the Congress that we were not irrigating the land in proportion to the money invested. Then from time to time the money was taken and used in what they call the lateral ditches, and there remains yet a lot of work to be done to build the necessary reservoir to conserve the water to use on those lands. The criticism as I understand now by the committee is that we have more acres of land to which water can be supplied than is being utilized by the farmers.

Mr. SNYDER. The criticism that this Congress makes, or that anyone would make who knows anything about the proposition, is that you did not start getting some water before you began building ditches. There are hundreds of miles of ditches and no water for them. If they had built some dams and reservoirs for water in the first place and then built the laterals I think the situation would have had more sympathy from this House.

Mr. EVANS of Montana. Of course I am not to blame for that and Congress is not to blame for that. That was an engineering undertaking and if engineers made a mistake about that Congress should not penalize those people now. They have been there from 12 to 15 years waiting for this water. They can not get title to their lands. The Government declines to give them title until they have paid for the land. They have not only to pay for the water but they have to pay for the land. It is a pitiful situation.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EVANS of Montana. Yes.

Mr. LITTLE. If the dams were there, could sufficient water be assembled?

Mr. EVANS of Montana. Yes; there is plenty of water running to waste down the mountain side, if we could put it into the reservoirs, lakes, and the like of that.

Mr. LITTLE. That would not take very long.

Mr. EVANS of Montana. No; but this bill provides for cutting off, discontinuance of the work entirely.

Mr. LITTLE. And they have the ditches dug?

Mr. EVANS of Montana. Yes; but we have not the reservoirs. The criticism is that we can supply water to more land than is now being paid for. In other words, people are allowing the water to run by their places and are not utilizing it. To a degree there is merit in that criticism, but I think not the merit that the committee attaches to it. A man can not take a 40 or an 80-acre tract of land and put water on it the first year. Any man who knows anyhing about irrigation knows that that can not be done. It takes time and money and patience to reclaim land and it takes some years ordinarily to reclaim all of a farm in an irrigated project.

Mr. LITTLE. How many people live on these water rights?

Mr. EVANS of Montana. I think approximately 2,000.

Mr. LITTLE. Two thousand farms?

Mr. EVANS of Montana. Something like that, in small tracts. I think about 1,000. I know that within the limit of this reserve, which is largely fed from this reclamation project, there are at least 10,000 people and they have been there for more than 15 years.

The Government invited them to come there and said, "We will let you have this tract for so much—$8 an acre—this tract for so much—$10 an acre," and so forth, and they took it.

Mr. LITTLE. Have not they any other resources besides irrigable land?

Mr. EVANS of Montana. There is some land that is not irrigable.

Mr. LITTLE. Pasture lands?

Mr. EVANS of Montana. Pasture land and the like of that.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. EVANS of Montana. Just a moment. I sincerely hope this project will not be cut off——

Mr. CRAMTON. I yield the gentleman three additional minutes.

Mr. EVANS of Montana. I have no censure for the committee or for the House about this business. I think the whole thing has been badly managed by the Congress during the last 15 years. If adequate appropriations had been made, the whole thing could have been closed up five years ago. They have spent a large amount of money on the overhead, because of the delay in making adequate appropriations.

Mr. ABERNETHY. What is the amendment of the Senate?

Mr. EVANS of Montana. Three hundred thousand dollars. The Bureau of the Budget recommended $300,000 or $400,000, I think, for this project for this year, and certainly they should not now stop in the middle of this work. It means they will disperse the organization they have and organize a new one next year or the next to start the work again, and surely the $5,000,000 invested ought not to go to waste.

Mr. HASTINGS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EVANS of Montana. I will.

Mr. HASTINGS. What is the matter before us now; what is the recommendation of the conference committee?

Mr. EVANS of Montana. The conferees insist upon disagreeing—that there be no money spent on the project this year. The Senate put on an amendment to appropriate $300,000 and the conferees do not agree. The gentleman in charge of the bill has moved to continue to disagree, and I offered a preferential motion which is to recede and concur.

If my motion carries, $300,000 will be appropriated to continue the work this year.

Mr. SNYDER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EVANS of Montana. I will.

Mr. SNYDER. How can the chairman of the subcommittee do anything else but disagree under the law?

Mr. EVANS of Montana. I do not know.

Mr. SNYDER. He says he can not tell the House that the department has carried out the law and that the users of the water will eventually pay for it. This money, gentlemen, is reimbursable, and no one, so far as we know, has agreed to pay any back.

Mr. EVANS of Montana. But that is not my understanding. The money is to be reimbursed.

Mr. SNYDER. We want to know whether the law is being reasonably lived up to. I am perfectly willing everything should go ahead if the money is being expended in some way that will finally do the property owners some good, but it has not been done.

Mr. EVANS of Montana. I do not think there is any doubt the money is being properly used, so why kill this project and lose the money—$5,000,000—already expended on the same. These people are perfectly willing to pay the money back if the project is completed. There may be, indeed there are, some of them who have not complied with all the details. If necessary, put a limitation upon this appropriation, any reasonable limitation, and I will agree to it. If legislation has got to be enacted in Montana it can not be done until the legislature meets again next year. There was no legislative session this January. Now, why kill this project? I beg of you, gentlemen, to give this matter your favorable consideration at this time.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. CRAMTON. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Montana [Mr. LEAVITT].

Mr. LEAVITT. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I rise in support of the motion made by the gentleman from Montana [Mr. EVANS] that we do not concur in the recommendation of the conference committee. The situation is this: There has been spent during the period of something like 15 years about $5,000,000 in the development of an irrigation project in the Flathead Valley of Montana and about 65 per cent of that project has been completed. The question has been asked whether any arrangement has been made for the repayment of this money to the Federal Treasury. I might answer that by saying there has been paid $125,000 in round numbers and there will be agreements which will lead to the return of every penny of this amount to the Federal Treasury. I am not going to try to claim to you that all the money has been paid which ought to have been paid under the agreement, but in connection with that I want to call attention to the situation in regard to agriculture everywhere, and particularly in that western country. I want to call attention to this fact, that during 1923 there were about 1,000 water accounts on that project and that means there are at least 1,000 families which are using that water and are dependent upon its use for making a reasonable crop. In addition to that, there were something like 60 new settlers who came in full expectation the Government was going ahead with that project, and——

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEAVITT. I will.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Where does the water come from if there are no dams provided to store it up?

Mr. LEAVITT. That is a very pertinent question, and I want to say that some dams are provided, but it requires the completion of further storage units in connection with them, and remember this, that the storage units can not be built this year and used the next. It requires a period of at least three or four or five years for new works to settle, and therefore it is necessary that this project be completed in advance.

Mr. HUDSPETH. There is a reasonable certainty that this loan in time, at least, would be returned by these settlers in Montana, is there not?

Mr. LEAVITT. By the people on the project. There is a certainty of that. They have paid, as I say, about $125,000, and the delay of the Federal Government in completing the project has been the principal reason, gentlemen of the House, for the delay in the settlement of the project as well as other projects in the western country. It has been 15 years since the first people went on there, with the expectation that this project would be completed, and they have been waiting from year to year, and all efforts to colonize the area and bring people in have been held back because of the failure of the Government to go ahead and complete. The step that is contemplated now by this conference committee will go still further to discourage settlement and will delay and put far into the future all possibility of the paying back of the $5,000,000 already expended by the Federal Government.

We can not afford to concur with the recommendations that have been made. While we are talking about a square deal with the Treasury let us think also of a square deal to the 1,000 homesteaders on that project. Let us remember that this is entirely an action of the subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations, that the Reclamation Service asked for $800,000, that the Bureau of the Budget agreed to $350,000, and that the Senate of the United States has written into this measure an appropriation of $300,000, and that the only thing that stands in the way of justice for these people and the settlement of that section in the West is the opinion of three men on this conference committee, who refuse now to agree to the settlement proposed by the Senate of the United States and put this item back in the bill where it belongs.

I ask you, gentlemen, in justice to vote "yes" on the motion that has been submitted by my colleague from Montana [Mr. EVANS].

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I yielded 13 minutes to those in favor of the provision. I do not want to take up more time for myself. I wish to be notified at the end of 10 minutes.

There are three elements involved here, of which the principal one is amendment No. 16. The gentleman from Montana, Judge EVANS, desires $300,000 for construction, operation, and maintenance, whereas the committee provides $50,000. On Fort Peck Judge EVANS desires $30,000 and my recommendation is $15,000. On the Blackfoot proposition Judge EVANS desires $50,000 and my proposition is $20,000. There is therefore a difference of $305,000, if I am correct in my computation, between his proposition and mine.

I want the committee and the House to understand it. My only reason for my attitude here is that I am doing that which I think it is my duty to do in view of the information before the committee, and we took particular care to get all the information we could. If it were a personal matter, there are no two Members of the House whom I would rather please than the gentlemen from Montana [Mr. LEAVITT and Mr. EVANS]. But we are not approaching the subject from that point of view, and they would not expect me to.

Now, as to the Flathead irrigation district that the gentlemen have spoken about, the situation is this: Under present constructed works there are 105,500 acres that has water available. There is actually irrigated out of that 105,500 acres only 30,800 acres.

Mr. EVANS of Montana. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAMTON. I will make the statement that the gentleman wants, if he will permit me to proceed for a moment. There is a margin of 75,000 acres. I admit that there is a question about there being enough water for the 105,500 acres, and greater reservoirs are desired in order to make it sure. But there is ample water now for more than 30,000 acres. This danger of lack of water does not take up this margin of 75,000 acres. The trouble is that country is in the shadow line between dry farming and irrigation, and there is a grave doubt in the minds of people living on those lands whether they want irrigation or not, and it is demonstrated by the fact brought out in the hearings that year by year they vary in the use of the water. The first reason why I am opposing the appropriation is that there is a lot of land now available, more than is being used; and second, those who have water brought to their gates day by day have an option under the existing conditions as to whether they will pay any maintenance charges or not. This year they may think it is going to be a dry season, and they will use the water brought by the Government, but next year may not be a dry season and they will let the water go by their gates and will not contribute a nickel to the operation charges.

Now, when these men come to the point where they are willing either to fish or cut bait, either to conduct dry farming or farming by irrigation, and pay year by year the operation and maintenance charge, we shall have a basis upon which to decide what should be done. These people have no standing here as a matter of equity. The hearings show that there are 155 Indians engaged on this reservation in irrigation, and there are 300 white owners and 402 white lessees. We have expended already $4,500,000, and only 30,000 acres is being irrigated. There is also to be noted the fact that the operation and maintenance charges are not in full coming back.

Now, I asked Mr. Beadle, a representative of the Reclamation Service, why it was that the lands are not fully used and the charges not fully repaid. I asked him, "That is due to the fact that the projects are not fully constructed?" Mr. Beadle answered, "Yes, sir; and it is due to the fact that even the lands under ditch are not fully used"—the lands mentioned a while ago. I need not quote again the reference to the law of Montana, which confirms what I have just said. I made this statement in the hearings, in the presence of a representative of the Indian Service and a representative of the Reclamation Service:

> Here is the situation about storage, as I understand it. I do not want to prove anything; I want to develop what the situation is. We have got enough water. We do not have to spend another nickel so far as the 105,000 acres that now have water rights are concerned. Ordinarily about 5 years out of 6, or 9 out of 10, or at least 2 out of 3, there is enough water for these 105,000 acres, and in those years only about one-third of that 105,000 acres will use the water. But there comes a dry season once in three years, let us say, when the rains are limited and everybody passes up the dry farming and jumps in and wants water from the project at a time when there is the least water. Therefore there arises the necessity for storage in order to have a reserve for such an occasion. So we are to go on spending millions of dollars, not to take care of the year-by-year use but to take care of the emergency needs of those who do not appreciate the water at any other time. Is that the argument for this appropriation?

Mr. LEAVITT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAMTON. Yes.

Mr. LEAVITT. Is it not true that the failure to populate and develop this irrigation project is largely due to the fact that the uncertainty of development and completion of the project keeps people from going on the project?

Mr. CRAMTON. No; it is the general pessimistic outlook after they get there. Now, let me continue——

Mr. LEAVITT. Will the gentleman permit me to complete my question?

I have lived in that country for a good many years and Judge EVANS has lived there all his life, and I think that the gentlemen who come from irrigation States know that is the fact, that uncertainty is the real cause. Now, I come to my question: If that is true, is it not better business for the Government to go ahead and complete the project so that it can be colonized, as was being done this year, when 60 new families came in?

Mr. CRAMTON. Let me answer the gentleman. Sometime it may be proper for us to complete this project; but now, when we have water available for thousands of acres which is not being used, and when those who have the water at their gates pay for it only when they feel like it, this is not the time to take from a Treasury burdened as ours is at this time a large sum of money to spend on this project.

Now, further, the department could not tell this committee what they would do with the $300,000 if it were granted. Mr. Beadle said no program had been made by the Reclamation Bureau for the use of that money; and I asked them to put in the record a statement, after consultation between the two services, as to what program is intended under this $300,000 appropriation, but there is nothing in the record as to that.

Now, there is also involved in this same amendment the second item for the Fort Peck project. The amount is not so large, but it is a similar situation. Let me call to your attention the fact that the adoption of Judge EVANS'S amendment would cover this.

The Budget Bureau recommended $30,000 for operation and maintenance, which we propose to cut to $15,000. The evidence showed that of the 23,115 acres under the existing constructed works there are actually irrigated only 622 acres, and that we are paying $30,000 a year for the operation and maintenance of 622 acres, $50 per acre, of which only 406 acres are cultivated by Indians and 216 acres by whites. Can anyone say that I had any right, as a member of the Appropriations Committee, to recommend any such absurd figure for the operation and maintenance of 622 acres?

The whole situation was set forth by the representative of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, Mr. Meritt, the assistant commissioner. On an earlier page Mr. Reed sets forth the fact that he has gone over this situation. He says:

There are miles of well-constructed canals and structures, such as headgates, turnouts, etc., that are not in use and have not been wet in some years except by rainfall or snowfall; and the Indians have not taken interest in it. They contend that they do not want it. On the other side, the whites have gone through the depression that other farmers have and have abandoned their farms that have been irrigated, and the place for that reason looks like a wreck.

Mr. Meritt said:

I have given the Indian irrigation projects considerable study. It has been my judgment that we should not spend large amounts of money for new construction where the land already under irrigation projects is not being fully utilized. In other words, we should utilize the irrigable lands available before we spend large sums of money on new land.

Mr. LEAVITT. May I ask this question of the gentleman?

Mr. CRAMTON. Yes.

Mr. LEAVITT. Did either Judge EVANS or myself ask for the inclusion in this motion of the Blackfoot proposition, or was that included by the gentleman in order to defeat the Flathead project, which is the one we are talking about?

Mr. CRAMTON. Well, I will say that I have bound them together because they were similar, although I do know that the gentlemen from Montana are both most interested in the larger sum involved in the Flathead proposition. I am frank to say to the House that I have not called attention to the conditions which I have outlined concerning Fort Peck so much with reference to their bearing on the $15,000 involved there as to their bearing on the other item of $300,000, because any argument that has been made in behalf of the Flathead Reservation is valid for the Fort Peck Reservation as well.

Mr. LEAVITT. May I disagree with the gentleman?

Mr. SNYDER. Will the gentleman tell the House how many acres are being cultivated by Indians on the Flathead project?

Mr. LEAVITT. One thousand seven hundred acres.

Mr. CRAMTON. I think that must be pretty nearly right. They say 30,811 acres out of 105,500 are actually irrigated, 2,000 acres being cultivated by Indians and the balance by whites.

Mr. SNYDER. I want to say that when this matter was under investigation during the last administration, when Mr. Cato Sells was Commissioner of Indian Affairs, he made the statement before the committee that this project was of a very questionable nature and there was some question whether it would be proper to go ahead with it or not.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I simply want to make this one further statement, which I think I can do in the minute remaining. I want the House to understand there is a difference in irrigation among Indians. There are Indians like the Pimas, who have been irrigationists since before our forefathers came to this country. There are others like the Flathead and the Indians on the Fort Peck Reservation who have no interest in irrigation and who are opposed to this development. I do not criticize the beginning of this or the securing of water rights, but I do say that in this time of financial stringency we can well afford to withhold construction until they do catch up and need more acreage than they have now. I hope, therefore, that my committee may have the support of the House and that the motion of the gentleman from Montana [Mr. EVANS] may not be agreed to, and that the House will further insist on our disagreement.

Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question comes first on the motion of the gentleman from Montana to recede and concur.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. EVANS) there were—ayes 31, noes 33.

So the motion to recede and concur was rejected.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. Does that ipso facto carry with it the motion to insist or is it necessary to put the question on the motion to insist?

The SPEAKER. The question now comes on the motion of the gentleman from Michigan to insist.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next amendment in disagreement.

The Clerk read as follows:

For maintenance, to be used in payment of part of the salaries of the officers, professors, teachers, and other regular employees of the university, ice and stationery, the balance of which shall be paid from donations and other sources, of which sum not less than $2,200 shall be used for normal instruction, $125,000;

For tools, material, salaries of instructors, and other necessary expenses of the department of manual arts, $30,000;

Medical department: For part cost of needed equipment, laboratory supplies, apparatus, and repair of laboratories and buildings, $9,000;

For material and apparatus for chemical, physical, biological, and natural-history studies and use in laboratories of the science hall, including cases and shelving, $5,000;

For books, shelving, furniture, and fixtures for the libraries, $3,500;

For improvement of grounds and repairs of buildings, $20,000;

Fuel and light: For part payment for fuel and light, Freedmen's Hospital and Howard University, $15,000.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House recede and concur, and upon that motion I will just make this preliminary statement and then I will yield to the gentleman from South Carolina.

The appropriations for Howard University as they came to Congress from the Budget totaled something over $800,000, being something like $200,000 or a little less for maintenance, $127,500 for completion of the assembly hall and gymnasium, and $500,000 for a medical building and equipment. Your subcommittee and the Committee on Appropriations of the House recommended the completion of the assembly hall and gymnasium at $157,500 instead of partial completion at $127,500. We recommended $202,500 for the maintenance of the institution, a little more than the Budget recommended in some of the smaller items.

Mr. CARTER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAMTON. In just a moment.

But we did not recommend the item of $500,000 for the medical building and its equipment, feeling that it was a larger increase in the appropriation for this institution than the circumstances would warrant. I now yield to the gentleman.

Mr. CARTER. The gentleman will recall that I dissented from the recommendation.

Mr. CRAMTON. I recall that, and I was very sorry, because the gentleman from Oklahoma and I work so closely together, but there have to be exceptions to all rules, and on this occasion I lost the support of my most valued friend from Oklahoma.

On the floor of the House the $202,500 was stricken out on a point of order and went to the Senate, who restored that $200,000 and also put in the $500,000 item. In conference we have now agreed with the Senate conferees to the elimination of the $500,000 for the medical building but have agreed to have this restored, if the House in its wisdom would do so, and therefore I made this motion to restore the $202,500 item for operation and maintenance.

I yield to the gentleman from South Carolina 10 minutes.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, when the appropriation bill was before the House I made a point of order against these items on the ground that there was no law authorizing these appropriations.

Mr. LANKFORD. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is not a quorum present. This is an important matter and I think we ought to have a quorum.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia makes a point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I ask my friend to withdraw that. I am satisfied to go ahead and discuss this matter with the gentlemen on the floor.

Mr. LANKFORD. At the gentleman's request, I will withdraw it, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I am satisfied to present this cause to the Members on the floor at this time.

There is no law authorizing these appropriations. If the Congress is to continue to appropriate for this educational institution, it ought to have the courage to legislate and provide the manner in which these appropriations shall be made. This institution is located in the city of Washington. It is a private, educational institution established originally as a theological seminary back in 1867. It has a charter from the Congress, under which charter its board of trustees is a self-perpetuating body. It received no funds and asked for no funds of the Congress until 1873. Then when there was a financial depression they came and asked for funds for one year. The Congress was charitable and liberal enough to grant funds and like every other institution or individual that ever gets on the pay roll, they have remained on the pay roll from 1873 to this day. But for the appropriation there is absolutely no authority in the law.

A few moments ago the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON], in opposing the motion of the gentleman from Montana [Mr. EVANS], made the statement, in discussing a project that is authorized by law, that this is not the time to take money from the Treasury, burdened as it is. That was a true statement; and if it is true as to a project authorized by law, it certainly ought to be true as to a project that is not authorized by law. If Congress is to do the courageous thing, it ought to legislate and say that this one institution of all institutions in the country is to be selected to receive appropriations from the Congress. As it is located in the city of Washington, the Congress ought to say what portion of the funds should come from the revenues of the District of Columbia, because more than one-fifth of the students come from the city of Washington. Instead of doing that, from year to year these appropriations are carried in an appropriation bill. I have been asked why this particular institution is selected of all the institutions in the country to receive an appropriation from Congress. I can give no reason. If it is for the reason that it is a negro university, and Members feel that they must support a negro educational institution in order to secure negro votes, then I know of no reason why this particular institution should be selected from among all the negro institutions; why it should be selected in preference to Tuskegee, the Booker Washington institution, or in preference to the Hampton Institute of Virginia. Hampton and Tuskegee are presided over by negroes. No graduate of Howard University stands the slightest chance on earth of ever being made the president of Howard University. The same people have always managed to retain the presidency of that institution and to receive the salary that goes with the presidency. Tuskegee and Hampton Universities are doing splendid work and have made good citizens among the negroes of this country, teaching them trades instead of teaching them professions.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will permit, Hampton Institute is presided over by a white person.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Always?

Mr. BLAND. That is my understanding.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Then I withdraw the statement. Neither Hampton nor Tuskegee maintains a school of religion in connection with their institutions, and I know that no other institution having a theological seminary has ever asked for or received funds from the taxpayers of the United States through the action of the Congress of the United States.

I know that the president of that university, realizing that such an appropriation is unwise, states that no part of the funds are used for the maintenance of the theological seminary, and I make that statement in fairness to him. He says that no part of the fund is used to maintain the school of religion, but I tell you that the dollars that come from the Treasury of the United States are not marked. They go into the treasury of the university just as other funds do. More than 50 per cent of the funds of the university come from the United States Government, and when a man says the dollars that come from the Treasury of the United States are not used to maintain the theological seminary he might as well argue with equal force that they are not used to pay a professor in mathematics or a professor in law. Those funds go into the common funds of the university. The Congress ought to know, if they are going to vote for this proposition, that they are voting funds to maintain a school of religion not authorized by law, and I want to call attention to the kind of religion that is taught at that school of religion. The Rev. Francis J. Grimke, a member of the board of trustees, in an address delivered by him at the seventh annual convocation of the school of religion of Howard University on November 20, 1923, declared, among other things:

> Here in this city we have a federation of churches—a federation of what kind of churches? A federation of white churches. The very fact that such a federation exists in this city shows what kind of Christianity we have here; what kind of Christianity is represented in these churches. It is not a federation of Christian churches, but a federation of white churches, which shows that these churches, consciously or unconsciously, are standing for a Christianity that lays greater emphasis upon the color of a man's skin than upon his Christian character.

Again, in the same address he said:

> We have also in this city a white Y. M. C. A. and a white Y. W. C. A., from which colored people are excluded, and excluded because they are colored, because they happen to be of another race variety. The very fact of the existence of such associations is a standing reproach to the Christianity that they represent.

Further on he said:

> I have very little faith in the Christianity of Mr. Woodrow Wilson; but what he says in his article, "The road away from revolution," in the August number of the Atlantic Monthly, is well worth careful consideration. "Our civilization," he says, "can not survive materially unless it is redeemed spiritually. It can be saved only by becoming permeated with the spirit of Christ and being made free and happy by the practices which spring out of that spirit."
>
> True, true; but how can our civilization become permeated with the spirit of Christ when professing Christians, like Mr. Woodrow Wilson and Mr. William Jennings Bryan, outstanding figures in the church, go on preaching and practicing the kind of Christianity which they represent?

Again:

> And there is no better place to hold up that fact than here, no better place from which to send out a message like that than here, in connection with this convocation, held under the auspices of the school of religion of this university. It is a shame, a burning shame that we are under the domination of a Christianity that discriminates against human beings, made in the image of God, and for whom Christ died, on account of race and color.

Further on he says:

> And in the effort that must be made to rescue the Christianity of to-day from the spirit, the unbrotherly, un-Christian spirit that now has possession of it, if our faith is weak, and if we are not willing to go to the scaffold if need be, not willing to suffer, we won't be of much service. Very little can be expected in this great moral and religious crusade that must be waged from the timorous, the half-hearted, the cowardly.

Those are the words of the Rev. Francis J. Grimke, a member of the board of trustees of the university for which you are now asked to appropriate $200,000 of the money of the taxpayers of America. He endeavored to arouse prejudice against the white people and incite these young negroes to acts of violence because negroes were not admitted to membership in white churches and in the Y. M. C. A. and Y. W. C. A.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Yes, if the gentleman will give me three minutes more.

Mr. CRAMTON. I very gladly do that.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Then I yield.

Mr. CRAMTON. Will the gentleman object to inserting in his remarks the complete address?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I shall be very glad to do so at the end of my remarks.

Mr. Speaker, I do not hold a university responsible for a sermon or a speech delivered by any invited speaker, for whom the university assumes no responsibility, but this man is one of the board of trustees controlling this university, and if he does not speak the views of the university there ought to be a disavowal of it; and to this good day there has been no disavowal. As a private institution they can express any views they desire, if supported by private funds. But they should not denounce the white churches of America and Young Men's Christian Association and the Young Women's Christian Association and then come here and ask us to vote the money of the taxpayers of our districts for the support of such an institution. If you do, you ought to tell your constituents what you are doing. You are not contributing to the support of a school of religion in any one of the States of the Union. In your districts you have good schools that would like to receive appropriations from the Congress of the United States, which perhaps are in urgent need of appropriations. You can not get Congress to contribute a dollar for them, but you now want to go on record as giving $300,000 to this institution. They already have in this bill $157,000. Vote for this amendment and you give them $200,000 more, and when you do that you place your stamp of approval on the kind of religion that is being taught by Grimke in Howard University at the expense of your constituents. So far as I am concerned, I am not willing to do it. I do not believe that the people of the United States ought to be called upon to support any school of religion. It is against the spirit, if not the letter, of the Constitution. The experience of years has proved that it is an unwise and dangerous policy. But if Congress is to continue this unwise policy and appropriate public funds to support a school of religion, certainly it should exercise some control over the institution and prevent the preaching of sermons the only effect of which can be to poison the minds of these students, arouse their prejudice against the white people of the country, make them discontented with their lot in life, and disturb the harmonious relations now existing.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from South Carolina has expired.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I regret very much that my time has expired, because I wanted to call attention to the fact that one of the lecturers on the catalogue of the university for 1915-16, which has been forwarded to me, advertises that Mrs. Rose Pastor Stokes will during the year lecture to the students on the essentials of socialism.

Mr. MADDEN. She is not a member of the board of trustees.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. No; but she was invited by the university and advertised in the catalogue as one of the lecturers to lecture to the students of Howard University on the essentials of socialism. Of course, the Government has no control of the situation. But you are asked to select this in preference to all other institutions and appropriate $200,000 to encourage the teaching of socialism by such people as Rose Pastor Stokes and religion by this man Grimke. That is not the kind of university for which I want to appropriate the money of the taxpayers of my district. [Applause.]

While the appropriation of $200,000 was allowed by a vote of 200 to 105, the appropriation of $500,000 added by the Senate for this university was defeated.

At the request of Mr. CRAMTON I insert in its entirety the sermon of Francis J. Grimke:

WHAT IS THE TROUBLE WITH THE CHRISTIANITY OF TO-DAY? THERE IS SOMETHING WRONG ABOUT IT. WHAT IS IT?

(An address delivered by the Rev. Francis J. Grimke, pastor of the Fifteenth Street Presbyterian Church, Washington, D. C., at the seventh annual convocation of the school of religion of Howard University, Washington, D. C., November 20, 1923.)

Ladies and gentlemen, in the time that I am to occupy I wish to address my remarks to the question, What is the trouble with the Christianity of to-day? There is something wrong about it; what is it? In one direction, at least, I think I know what the trouble is.

To my mind it is its hypocrisy, its manifest insincerity. It professes to believe what it does not believe; it professes to believe what it has no intention of living up to, except so far as it doesn't interfere with its selfish aims, so far as it does not run counter to its prejudices. The great indictment which Jesus Christ would make against it if He were here to-day is, "Why call ye me Lord, Lord, and do not the things which I say?"

(1) Its great deficiency, as I view it, is not in the line of its nonacceptance of Jesus Christ as the Great Teacher sent from God. It hails Him as the greatest of teachers. It has studied, and studied very carefully, all the things that He has said. Every word that fell from His lips, as handed down in the Scriptures, it knows and knows the meaning of. Volumes have been written extolling Him as teacher and expounding His words, setting forth His ideals and principles. The Christianity of to-day is not deficient in knowledge of what Jesus said, of what was clearly in His mind as to the principles that were to have sway in His kingdom. He not only while He was on earth outlined what those principles and ideas were, but after He had gone, in accordance with His promise, sent the Holy Spirit to guide the apostles in unfolding those principles. No one can read the 21 Epistles of the New Testament and fail to see exactly what is involved in the teachings of Jesus Christ. Everything is set forth clearly, line upon line, precept upon precept, here a little and there a little. The Christianity of to-day knows perfectly well what is required of it, what it ought to be, and what it ought to do.

(2) Its great deficiency, as I see it, is not in its nonacceptance of Jesus Christ as priest. It makes much of His atoning blood; it magnifies the cross of Christ as the great sacrifice for sin. "As Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness, even so must the Son of man be lifted up that whosoever believeth on Him should not perish, but have everlasting life," it preaches. It believes that Jesus is the only mediator between God and man and that His blood cleanses from all sin.

On these two points it seems to be mainly or largely right; but when we go a step further and think of Jesus Christ as king we find that it is far from being right. The one thing which it does not acknowledge, except in a halting, hypocritical way, is the right of Jesus Christ to control its action, to say what it shall do and what it shall not do. It has never learned and shows no disposition to learn the great lesson which God taught centuries ago through Samuel, "To obey is better than sacrifice, and to hearken than the fat of rams." The Christianity of to-day is a Christianity that makes no serious effort to carry out the whole counsel of God, to live up to the full requirements of His most holy and righteous laws. Its attitude toward these requirements is precisely that of the bootlegger and the whole criminal gang represented by the liquor power in this country in regard to the eighteenth amendment and the Volstead Act; it chooses among these God-given requirements which it will carry out and which it will not. When its prejudices are crossed, its selfish interests interfered with, it sidetracks the law of God, it shuts its eyes to the violation of the most sacred and fundamental principles laid down by the founder of Christianity. It professes, e. g., to believe in the fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man—these are both vital and fundamental principles in Christianity—and straightway, in the face of these principles, everywhere is setting up barriers against men on account of race and color.

Here in this city we have a federation of churches—a federation of what kind of churches? A federation of white churches. The very fact that such a federation exists in this city shows what kind of Christianity we have here, what kind of Christianity is represented in these churches. It is not a federation of Christian churches, but a federation of white churches, which shows that these churches, consciously or unconsciously, are standing for a Christianity that lays greater emphasis upon the color of a man's skin than upon his Christian character.

What right has any group of churches, calling itself Christian, to set up barriers against another group on account of race or color? When the Christianity of to-day comes to recognize fully the authority of Jesus Christ in all that it does; when it turns a deaf ear to every other consideration except the will of Jesus, as Lord, there will be no white churches, nor white federation of churches; nor will there be any colored churches, or colored federation of churches. All churches and all federations of churches will be open alike to all who are Christians without distinction of race, color, or condition.

We have also in this city a white Y. M. C. A. and a white Y. W. C. A., from which colored people are excluded, and excluded because they are colored, because they happen to be of another race variety. The very fact of the existence of such associations is a standing reproach to the Christianity that they represent. What right has any so-called Christian association to draw the color line on anyone? It may have the right as an association to do so, but not as long as it bears the name Christian. That name, that sacred name, forbids all such distinctions. And the man who does not see that it does, is either a fool or is woefully ignorant of what Christianity really is and what it teaches. Surely the wayfaring man, though a fool, if he knows anything about Christianity, the Christianity which Jesus taught and lived, knows that such distinctions are entirely out of place in a Christian organization.

And the reason why such distinctions exist and why they continue to exist is because the church has persistently refused to render to Jesus the obedience which is His due. He speaks—speaks in His beautiful spirit, in His noble character and life, in the great principles and ideals set forth by Him; but the church will not hear, or, rather, hears but will not obey. The evil within it overpowers the good. It listens, as Eve did, to the tempter instead of to the voice of God.

Only within this present month, just about two weeks ago, a thing occurred in this city which will help to throw some light upon the character of our present-day Christianity. A professor in this university, the dean of one of the colleges, a gentleman, a scholar, a man worthy of the highest respect, a man fit to live in the choicest section of any city in the country, was waited upon by 500 of his white neighbors, men and women, and told to get out of his own house, purchased with his own hard earnings. And why? Not because he was a criminal, a thief, a penitentiary convict, a bootlegger; not because his moral character was such as to render his presence in the neighborhood undesirable—he is, in every respect, the peer, if not the superior of every man and woman in that crowd who waited on him—but he was ordered out simply because he happened to be identified with the colored race. The color of his skin was his only offense.

And strange to say, but it is not strange, the meeting where the resolutions were passed decreeing his expulsion was held in the United Brethren Church, a Christian organization. And we are further told, after forming in line, the 500 men and women as they marched to the residence of this colored gentleman sang:

"Onward, Christian soldiers,
Marching as to war,
With the cross of Jesus
Going on before."

Imagine, if you can, the cross of Jesus going on before in pursuit of any such infamous undertaking as that.

When this outrage on this highly respectable and law-abiding citizen was reported in the papers the next morning, did the entire Christian community, in the name of Jesus Christ and of common decency, rise up and solemnly denounce the outrage? No! No! Not a word of disapproval, of condemnation was heard; nor has any been heard since.

The fact that such a demonstration could take place in a so-called Christian community, and could take place without being condemned, and the fact that those who fomented the agitation were permitted to meet and lay their plans in a Christian church, show clearly the kind of Christianity that we are up against; how far, far removed it is from the spirit and teachings of Jesus Christ.

So that if I am asked, What is the matter with the Christianity of to-day? My answer is, Its lack of the spirit of Jesus Christ; its lack of obedience to the revealed will of God; its failure to recognize, except in part only, the kingship of Jesus Christ. A Christianity that is deficient, as present-day Christianity is, in the spirit of obedience to Christ is a Christianity under which all kinds of evil may be expected to exist. Race prejudice and every other evil that is cursing the world to-day would speedily disappear if the men and women professing to be Christians, some forty millions in this country alone, would honestly, without equivocation, without reservation, make up their minds to obey Jesus Christ, to be true to Christian ideals and principles. As long as we have a Christianity that is content with saying, "Lord, Lord," but do not the things which Jesus enjoins, conditions will continue as they are, the world will go on its way to the devil, and the church with it.

The only hope for the world, as I see it, is in a better type of Christianity. And there never will be a better type of Christianity until the spirit which says: "Not my will, but Thine be done." "Speak, Lord, for Thy servant heareth," takes possession of it. We can not serve God and mammon; we can not serve God and the devil; we can not be true to God and to our prejudices. And that is the lesson which the church is so slow to learn. John Wesley said:

> "If I had 300 men who feared nothing but God, hated nothing but sin, and were determined to know nothing among men but Jesus and Him crucified, I would set the world on fire."

What could not the 40,000,000 of professing Christians in this country do, in correcting evils that are everywhere about us, if they were what they profess to be; if they were loyal to the King in whose service they are supposed to be enlisted? The world will never be what it ought to be until there is brought to bear upon it a Christianity that sincerely, honestly aims, and as sincerely and honestly strives to bring every thought and every imagination into captivity to Jesus Christ as Lord. It must be a Christianity that knows nothing among men but Jesus Christ; nothing among men but Jesus Christ as prophet, as priest, as King. If His kingship doesn't enter into it; if He is not really the power that is ruling in it, it will be powerless to save a lost world; it will be no better than the present brand of Christianity.

I have very little faith in the Christianity of Mr. Woodrow Wilson; but what he says in his article, "The road away from revolution," in the August number of the Atlantic Monthly, is well worth careful consideration. "Our civilization," he says, "can not survive materially unless it is redeemed spiritually. It can be saved only by becoming permeated with the spirit of Christ and being made free and happy by the practices which spring out of that spirit."

True, true; but how can our civilization become permeated with the spirit of Christ, when professing Christians, like Mr. Woodrow Wilson and Mr. William Jennings Bryan, outstanding figures in the church, go on preaching and practicing the kind of Christianity which they represent? How can our civilization become permeated with the spirit of Christ, when the church itself, the visible representative of Christ, is not permeated with it? In the cowardly roll which it is playing to-day; in the ignoble surrender which it is making to the forces of evil, it is not only playing false to Jesus Christ its Lord, but is also imperiling the most sacred interests of humanity. Its value to the world is and will be just in proportion as it is loyal to the spirit, the principles, the ideals of Jesus Christ. There can be no halfway acceptance of these ideals and principles. It must accept all of them or none of them, the whole of Christ or none of Christ, if it is to do effectively the work to which it is called of God.

That is the way I feel about it. I may be all wrong, of course; Jesus Christ may never have intended His followers to follow Him, to conform to His spirit and teachings; He may have meant for them simply to look over His scheme of life and pick out of it so much of it as suits their fancy, their whims and caprices, their likes and dislikes, and let the rest go. If so, then the present-day Christianity is all right, and things will go on as they are, will never be any better than they are. A cowardly, time-serving, unbrotherly, stiff-necked, uncircumcised, color-prejudiced Christianity can never save this world, can never bring it to Christ—a world two-thirds of the inhabitants of which are not white but colored.

A man said to me not long ago—we were studying a book, Money and Acid Test—"Doctor Grimke, so far as the white man's religion is concerned, the acid test is not money, but his attitude toward the colored man." And what he said is true. The white man's Christianity will never be what it ought to be until it is big enough, broad enough to forget the color of a man's skin or his race variety, until it rises superior to the spirit of colorphobia, with which it is at present afflicted. And there is no better place to hold up that fact than here, no better place from which to send out a message like that than here, in connection with this convocation, held under the auspices of the school of religion of this university. It is a shame, a burning shame, that we are under the domination of a Christianity that discriminates against human beings, made in the image of God, and for whom Christ died, on account of race and color! And, as a convocation, let us say so; and say it, not with bated breath but boldly; say it in the fear of God; say it as ambassadors of God. The heathen may rage; but we know, as well as we know anything, that this attitude of present-day Christianity is wrong, abominably wrong, and that God can not and does not approve of it. And if we fail to say so, and fail to do all we can to bring about a change, we, too, are traitors to God and to humanity; we, too, are utterly unworthy to bear the name Christian.

I know, of course, what will be said: You are a pessimist. It may be that I am. Isaiah was, doubtless, regarded as a pessimist in his day, when he lifted up his voice like a trumpet and cried aloud:

> "What unto me is the multitude of your sacrifices? said Jehovah; I have had enough of the burnt offerings of rams and the fat of fed beasts; and I delight not in the blood of bullocks, or of lambs, or of he-goats. When ye come to appear before me, who hath required this at your hands, to trample my courts? Bring no more vain oblations; incense is an abomination unto me; new moons and sabbaths, the calling of assemblies, I can not away with; iniquity and the solemn meeting."

John the Baptist was, doubtless, regarded as a pessimist when he said to the scribes and Pharisees, the officials of the Jewish church, who came out to hear him, "Generation of vipers, who hath warned you to flee from the wrath to come. Bring forth fruits meet for repentance." And Jesus Christ himself was, doubtless, regarded as a pessimist when, in that memorable address of His, in the twenty-third chapter of Matthew, He cried out:

> "Woe unto you, scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites! for ye compass sea and land to make one proselyte; and when he is become so, ye make him twofold more a son of hell than yourselves."

If that is pessimism, then the more of it we have the better, the sooner there will be change for the better.

If to call present-day Christianity to an account for its lack of the spirit of Christ, in its shameful attitude on the race question, is to be a pessimist, then let us hope that there may be pessimists springing up all over the land and in all of the churches. That is the kind of pessimism that is needed, the kind of pessimism that has been back of all the moral and religious reforms that have taken place in the world. In spite of what may be said, in spite of being called pessimists, there is nothing for us to do but to go on upbraiding the church with its inconsistency, its unbrotherly, un-Christian spirit, until it either ceases to call itself Christian or makes up its mind to square its actions with its professed ideals and principles.

Those are my sentiments. There is where I stand. There is where I expect to stand until there is a change for the better.

A word now, in closing, by way of application. What can we do to help bring about such a Christianity? We may not be able to do very much, but one thing we can all do, we can enthrone Jesus Christ in our own hearts; we can make up our minds to be true to Him and to His principles and ideals, never mind how unpopular it may be or how unpleasant it may be made for us. We can not hope to do much toward improving the Christianity of to-day if we are cowards, if we are afraid to stand up for what we believe to be right, to be in harmony with the teachings of Jesus Christ. We want men, must have them, not only of convictions but men of courage who will stand up and be counted in the struggle between what is Christian and what is not.

> "Truth forever on the scaffold,
> Wrong forever on the throne,
> Yet that scaffold sways the future,
> And behind the dim unknown
> Standeth God within the shadow
> Keeping watch above his own."

So wrote James Russell Lowell during the great antislavery struggle in this country. (And in the effort that must be made to rescue the Christianity of to-day from the spirit—the unbrotherly, un-Christian spirit—that now has possession of it, if our faith is weak and if we are not willing to go to the scaffold if need be, not willing to suffer, we won't be of much service. Very little can be expected in this great moral and religious crusade that must be waged from the timorous, the half-hearted, the cowardly.) Within the next few years much, very much, will depend upon whether we are to have a better type of Christianity, a Christianity that will ring true every time and everywhere to the principles of Jesus Christ, or whether we are to have the same old, narrow, prejudiced, unbrotherly Christianity that we have to-day. Let us hope that a change for the better will come, and come speedily; and let us, one and all, make up our minds to do all that we can to hasten it.

I clipped from one of our magazines some time ago the following lines, entitled "Our fellowship":

> "Not dependent on identity of theological opinion,
> Nor on outward circumstances, nor of denominational name;
> But growing from a common loyalty to Jesus Christ,
> A common passion to serve the world,
> A common purpose to do justly, to love kindness,
> And to walk humbly with God."

That, it seems to me, furnishes a most excellent program for improving the type of our present-day Christianity. It is for us all to catch the spirit of it and to live under its great and inspiring influence.

Mr. LOWREY. Mr. Chairman, the question before us is simply this: Shall the Congress appropriate from the funds of the people $365,000 for the benefit of Howard University, theoretically a private institution, maintained here in the National Capital for the higher education of negroes?

First. The money does not belong to us. It is a fund which the people of this country have under their taxing laws brought together for the purpose of maintaining government. In our hands it is simply a trust fund which the people have committed to us, to be administered for the purposes for which it is collected. If we administer it otherwise we misappropriate trust funds.

To appropriate to this school is, in my opinion, unnecessary, unwise, unjust, and unconstitutional. To be perfectly candid, I hardly think the Negro race at their present stage of advancement need a great central university. I believe the consensus of opinion of their own wisest and best leaders is the need for good elementary schools, with normals for training their teachers, church schools for educating their religious leaders, industrial academies, and some larger industrial institutions, like Tuskegee and Hampton. These they have already. In every Southern State we, the white people, are contributing liberally to the support of negro common schools.

In almost every county the money paid to maintain schools for negro children is far beyond the proportion of tax which the negroes pay. In adition to this every Southern State supports a school of higher grade for negroes, and most of them support two or three such schools. And then there are the private and church schools, institutes, academies, and colleges by the score. In my own State, according to the report of the Department of the Interior in 1916, we have 47 such schools, at least a dozen of which are of recognized standing. In the Southern States there are more than 200 of them listed as being for "higher education." This of course does not mean higher classical education, but in many instances it means higher practical education of the first order.

In the North, too, you people are providing for your "colored friends" after a pretty acceptable fashion, though we do not expect you to befriend the negro or to understand him as we do. At least he does not suffer for college and university opportunities in the North, because you admit him to your great universities on a par with white students.

I therefore conclude that the education of the race would not be a hopeless question if they had no great university in Washington. Some one asked from the floor of this House in consternation, "If we fail to make this appropriation, what would become of Howard?" Well, now, let us look at that sensibly for a minute. Why might it not be supported by philanthropy and student fees, just as scores of great schools are supported for both races. A Washington negro boasted to me with just pride that his race pays tax on $20,000,000 worth of property in Washington. And the census of 1920 gives them nearly $700,000,000 worth of land in the 11 Southern States.

The figures for the rest of the country do not seem to be available, but they must swell the total considerably. I imagine that in Harlem, in New York City, negroes must own property reaching immense value. The same must be true in sections of Chicago, Philadelphia, Baltimore, and Indianapolis and in like degree throughout many northern and eastern cities.

With all this wealth, why not give them a chance to stand on their own feet a little and provide for this great school for themselves? After all the boast made about their splendid progress, are they still to be treated as a race of babes, and is our Federal Government to carry them forever in arms of paternalism?

The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON] refers to the fact that in the last campaign made for voluntary contributions to this school $5 out of every $6 contributed was given by alumni. And he turns triumphantly on us southern Democrats and asks, "Where were you then, that you did not help?" In answer to his "unpertinent" question I would say we were down in our southern homes paying our taxes to maintain negro schools, contributing voluntarily to the maintenance of negro churches, and befriending the negro generally in a way that some other people can not comprehend and know nothing about. The average white man in the South does more and sacrifices more to help the negro in a year than most of you gentlemen do in a lifetime.

But it seems to me more pertinent that we should ask, "Where were you then with your own money, you Congressmen who are so solicitous about the education of the negro in other communities and about the vote of the negro in your own communities; you who are now so anxious to give the people's money to this worthy cause?" Somehow I can not help having more admiration for the liberality of the man who gives his own money expecting no return than for the liberality of the man who gives the other fellow's money, expecting a return to Congress.

I believe that every man ought to be forever damned politically who buys votes with his own money, but it will be more tolerable in the day of judgment for that man than for the man who, intrusted with the power of taxation and appropriation, buys votes with the people's money. Understand, I do not accuse every man who votes for this appropriation of political motives, but in my heart I am very sure that it would be defeated if every man could absolutely forget the weight of the negro vote in doubtful States and districts.

Again, as I said, this appropriation is unjust. Here is Howard University with its great negro student body, three-fourths perhaps of whom live in Washington. Across over the city is George Washington University, with its great student body of young white men and women gathered from all over the land. Most of them work eight hours a day to make living expenses and attend school in the evening hours, paying for that privilege high tuition charges. You ask me to tax this second student body, along with the other people of the country, to build up the first institution whose tuition charges are almost nominal. The second institution struggles and presses a hard campaign for funds which are desperately needed, while Congress at a stroke gives the first institution enough money to build an average college.

A similar comparison might be made between Howard and a score of negro schools in the South. How can we justify this discrimination against all the others in favor of one which happens to be in the Capital City?

And one other consideration: My district this year is devastated by the boll weevil. Many of my colleagues represent wheat districts, where conditions are just as bad. Many hard-working farmers have lost their homes to satisfy debts. One-fifth of all the farms in the country have been sold within the last two years. In these hard times that means that most of them were sold because they had to be sold.

Many farmers have found it impossible even to borrow money to pay their taxes. Others have been unable to get books and clothing to keep their children in short-term public schools. Under a vicious tariff system and a blind foreign policy this Republican administration has crushed the American farmer as certainly as if it had started out with that deliberate intent. And now you ask for more tax money to provide university education for Washington negroes. The very thought is iniquity.

But if this appropriation were just would it be wise? A Washington citizen who was reared in a northern State said to me recently:

> Colored people are up against a hard proposition when they get herded together in a large city. The best place for them is on the farms.

I am not quoting my own opinion; I am quoting the opinion of a prominent northern man. I might quote the same opinion from prominent negro leaders. Every man before me who has really observed conditions in Cincinnati, Philadelphia, Chicago, and other such cities knows something of what the large accumulation of negroes in parts of these cities has meant socially, economically, and politically. From two men who are among the most prominent Republicans in the State of Indiana I have had rather lurid statements as to what the large negro population in Indianapolis has meant to their State capital. In several northern cities race relations have become so tense as to result in general burning of negro quarters and in wholesale murder—when it happens to individuals in the South they call it lynching—and expulsion. We have not forgotten some modern history of Washington along that line. I have heard able Republican Members of this House, men from northern States, object to the franchise for the District of Columbia because of the negroes here, reasoning that we could not thus risk bringing our National Capital under black domination.

Now, it is absolutely certain that the more we make Washington a center of negro education the more will it become a mecca for negro population. "With charity for all and malice toward none," is that good for either negroes or whites, for either the Capital City or the Nation?

But, finally, I believe appropriations of this sort to be contrary to both the spirit and the letter of the Constitution. The Constitution prescribes the powers of Congress and the general purposes for which we may appropriate. No appropriation for a university is suggested, especially for a university under semi-private control, maintained for a special class within the population. A committee brought into the Constitutional Convention a provision for the establishing of a great general university, open to all, and the framers of the Constitution rejected even that. Certainly the appropriation of Government funds to a school in which the Government owns no interest and over which it holds no shadow of control is lawless and unlawful.

So far as I recall, only one man in this debate has even attempted to defend this appropriation from a constitutional or legal standpoint. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] did make the appeal to precedent. He claims as sufficient legal ground the fact that Congress in its wisdom began appropriating to this school in 1878 and has kept it up for half a century. The same kind of argument, by the way, would have perpetuated witch burning, slavery, and the saloon. All these were maintained by law for more than 50 years.

But I remind our friend that in 1873 Congress, when dealing with the negro question, was not doing things "in its wisdom." It was doing things in startling unwisdom, as the world now agrees. Those were the days of the Freedman's Bureau, the heartless reconstruction, the carpetbagger, and the full enfranchisement of the millions of degraded and illiterate recently liberated slaves—the tragedies and crimes of our country's political history. God pity us if we are to look there for wisdom or for congressional acts worthy to be made our guiding precedents.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN].

Mr. MADDEN. At the outset, Mr. Speaker and gentlemen I admit, of course, that there is no law authorizing the appropriation for the maintenance and upkeep of Howard University, but the Congress in its wisdom has been doing this every year for more than 50 years. It began at the close of the war and we have continued ever since. If there is any work connected with the Government that justifies itself, it is that very work of helping to maintain this great institution of learning. The Southern States contribute directly to the maintenance of their universities, but they do not allow any colored men to attend the universities of the South.

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. Will the gentleman allow me to correct him right there?

Mr. ABERNETHY. The gentleman is in error.

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. In the State University at Georgia we have the Clark University at Savannah, Ga., and under State supervision with the same chancellor and supported by the State, at which colored students attend.

Mr. MADDEN. The time has come when I think we ought to answer the gentlemen who live in the Southern States when they denounce the propriety or wisdom or right of the Government to make a contribution to this institution for the education of those who, in a sense, are ostracized from all institutions of learning outside by our race. We who have control of the Government have a responsibility for action, and when I say that I mean the race to which we belong, and in admitting that responsibility we must be fair, we must be just, we must be discriminating, and we must not so act as to humiliate the people of another great race struggling in our midst for existence. It should be our duty as well as our pleasure to do everything within our power to promote the well-being, the happiness, and prosperity of those people. They are an essential part of the people of America. The prosperity of the Nation should be maintained, and I think I can venture the statement without fear of successful contradiction that within the last two or three years the people of the South itself have discovered a greater need for the people of the black race than ever before. They have discovered themselves that it is essential to give more consideration to the well-being of the colored people of the South than they have been willing to give before. Now, why should you object to the favorable consideration that is being given to this problem? Are you afraid to educate the Negro? Do you want to keep him in ignorance? Do you want to prevent him from becoming a factor in the commercial and industrial life of the Nation? Objection has been made from time to time against the appropriation of funds for the maintenance of Howard University, and opposition to this proposal at this time is not the only opposition that has been made by the gentleman from South Carolina, and I undertake to say without being certain as to the truth of what I say he has objected to this proposal before. This is not the first occasion. He does not believe in the advancement of the colored race.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. I will modify the statement to meet the gentleman's views.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. The gentleman is mistaken. The gentleman from Illinois said a while ago that all the Southern States have no negro universities. I desire to say to the gentleman that in the State of South Carolina there is a negro university, and the taxpayers of the State contribute to the support of that university, and in practically every Southern State I know anything about that is true.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for just a word?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes, indeed. I do not want to do any injustice to any section.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. In Florida we have a university for colored youth, supported out of the funds of the State, at Tallahassee.

Mr. MADDEN. The statement made by my friend, the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES], of the Committee on Appropriations, was to the effect that this is a local institution, if I recall what he said. It is not a local institution. It is a national institution. I think that there is greater need for this nation-wide opportunity for the higher education of the colored men and women of the Nation than there is for any other activity in which the people of the United States are engaged. We need not be afraid of the colored men and colored women. There are no socialists among them, no anarchists. They are law-abiding citizens. There never was an hour when the Nation needed defense when they did not volunteer their lives to preserve the Nation and its honor, and we should not now repudiate an appropriation intended to maintain this great national institution of learning which the colored people themselves are unable to maintain.

Now, what was the objection to the appropriation? Why was this point of order made? Presumably it was made because there is no law to authorize it. Of course, that is the only reason a point of order could be made. Senator SMOOT, in the Senate hearings on this bill, asked on what ground objection was made, and Senator MCKELLAR asked, "Why was a point of order made?" This was the answer given:

Doctor DURKEE. I can only answer, sir, from reading the RECORD of the House for the day. As I understand, the gentleman who made the point of order made it on the proposition that a clergyman came up to the university some few weeks ago at a convocation of clergymen, and in a meeting held in the chapel, at which there were between 50 and 60 clergymen and a few of the students of the school of religion only, this clergyman made an address, to which the gentleman of the House took exception and said that with such a statement as that he felt justified in raising the point of order.

Senator SMOOT. Was this clergyman a member of the faculty of Howard University?

Doctor DURKEE. No, sir; the clergyman is not a member of the faculty.

Senator SMOOT. Is he in any way connected with it?

Doctor DURKEE. He is a trustee of the university. He is a man who has been for 40 years pastor of the Fifteenth Street Presbyterian Church in this city, a man of wonderful balance, a man of great heart, a man who has stood for the finest and best things in his race.

Senator MCKELLAR. Is the language that is quoted here on pages 1659 and 1666 of the RECORD indorsed by you?

Doctor DURKEE. Will you kindly, sir, allow me to see it? I do not know just what it is.

Senator SMOOT. It is the statement that was read into the RECORD by Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina.

Doctor DURKEE (reading):

"I have very little faith in the Christianity of Mr. Woodrow Wilson"——

Is that what you refer to?

Senator MCKELLAR. Yes.

Doctor DURKEE. I am very frank to say that I do not agree with a statement like that, because I have had very profound respect for the Christianity of Mr. Woodrow Wilson.

Senator MCKELLAR. I do not mean that alone; but take the other quotations that he makes there. Do you approve of those? Just look over it a minute.

Doctor DURKEE. I have not read through his full article; but, as I understand it, the clergyman makes the general proposition that if Christian people can not agree, irrespective of color, then there is something wrong with the Christianity on the one side or the other. In other words, he objects to an attempt to establish a certain kind of Christianity for one race and another kind of Christianity for another race. That is the way I interpret it as I have read his article.

I think I can agree to that statement. There is something wrong if you can not agree. We are all trying to get to the same place. We are going by different routes. We all have our particular views as to what form of religious worship we shall follow. One belongs to the Methodist Church and one belongs to the Presbyterian Church and one belongs to the Congregationalist Church; one to this church and one to that. Each one hopes to reach the judgment seat of God upon a right road; but each road, according to their individual view, is the right road, and they are not going by the same road.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. CRAMTON. I yield to the gentleman five minutes more.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized for five minutes more.

Mr. MADDEN. In other words, he objects to an attempt to establish one kind of Christianity for one race and another kind for another race. That is what Mr. Grimke said. I read further:

Senator McKELLAR. No; he seems to have the view, as I judge from reading it, that it is a shame that the two races in Christian society are not commingled.

Doctor DURKEE. Well, that may be true, sir. I did not interpret it in that way. Of course, each of us has his own sense of what may be right or true as far as we ourselves are concerned.

Senator SMOOT. If you will read that statement made before the one that has been quoted, that statement shows the substance of what the Senator has just said.

Doctor DURKEE. Have I answered you, sir?

Senator McKELLAR. I was just wondering whether you, as the presiding officer of the institution, approved of that view.

Doctor DURKEE. Well, I think it is hardly necessary for me to approve or disapprove a statement of a gentleman who would come up on the campus simply to express his own views. Surely the university as a whole can not be held responsible for the views of an individual man who merely comes up there to make an address. I myself very frankly do not agree that one can not be a Christian man and yet not hold some views that another man who calls himself a Christian man holds. I state very frankly that each of us, according to our interpretation and our views of life, may hold views that fit his own conception of things. That is a general statement.

Now, I think if there is any politics in this, outside of the religious fervor which seems to have prompted the gentleman from South Carolina to make the objection to the appropriation when he made the point of order, he ought to be reminded of the fact that Mr. Grimke is a Democrat.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I do not know his politics, nor do I care; but the gentleman missed the point, that Mr. Grimke is a member of the board of trustees.

Mr. MADDEN. He was not speaking to the university. He was speaking on the campus to a delegation of ministers, and there happened to be some students there.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. If the gentleman will look for the facts as they were distributed all over the country, he will see that Mr. Grimke was addressing a school of religion.

Mr. MADDEN. I am not defending one who will preach law violation, whether Mr. Grimke or anybody else. I am in favor of law enforcement in the strictest sense of the word, whether it be the enforcement of the law with respect to religion, or the enforcement of the law with respect to prohibition, or the enforcement of the law with respect to taking life unjustly. I am in favor of the strong hand of the law being held against every violator of the law, and I am not in favor of allowing men to preach the doctrine of law violation. But I think the gentleman from South Carolina overreached the mark when he said that a sermon preached to these preachers on the campus of Howard University should hold Howard University and its management responsible for what some one said who can not be controlled by the university itself.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. CRAMTON. Since there was a reference to our late President Wilson in that address, does the gentleman from Illinois know anything about the politics of Rev. Mr. Grimke?

Mr. MADDEN. He is a Democrat; I said that, and I had him say that to me and to a committee of this House. One day there was a meeting of a committee, of which I was a member, some years since, where it was proposed to pass a bill to segregate the black people from the white people in the departments of the Government. Mr. Grimke came before the committee to protest; I asked Mr. Grimke what his politics were, and he said he was a Democrat. I said I did not understand how a man of his race could be a Democrat.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. The "gentleman from South Carolina" said nothing about the political affiliations of anybody in connection with this matter. I think the gentleman will agree to that. What I said was that when any man, who is a member of the board of trustees of this university, denounces the white churches, the Y. M. C. A., the Y. W. C. A., he ought not to be a member of the board of trustees of Howard University.

Mr. MADDEN. That is another thing. We are dealing with this appropriation. The mere fact that he made this statement—wrong though it may be—does not justify us in depriving the university of an appropriation in order to help it maintain an institution of learning for the people who are unable to meet their expenses. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BURTON].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio is recognized for three minutes.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Speaker, I regret there is not a larger attendance here this afternoon. I regard this question of extreme importance. An appropriation has been made for Howard University every year, beginning in the year 1873. If that does not have as much force as a statute would have, I can hardly understand the reason why.

We should make this appropriation, in the first place, on the ground of humanity. Howard University is the only institution of its kind in the United States; it is practically the only institution available to the colored race that has a medical and dental school. The statistics show that the number of physicians who take care of that race is extremely small; that while there is one white physician for every 553 persons of the white race, there is one colored physician to every 3,194 persons of the colored race. The proportion of dentists is even smaller.

This medical school is the principal professional school, although perhaps the law school equals it. As regards the theological school, that is of minor importance.

I very strongly condemn the language of the man who made this very peculiar address, but there are some of us who think that if a man of that race is a Democrat his mental processes would be wrong and that he would undoubtedly say something which would be very peculiar. [Applause.] But I do not think the institution should be condemned on that ground.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURTON. I have only three minutes.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I think the gentleman from Michigan will give the gentleman from Ohio an additional two minutes in order that I may ask him a question.

Mr. CRAMTON. I shall be glad to yield the gentleman two additional minutes if he desires them, but I do not want to take up too much time on this matter.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I only want to say this: When Grimke, this preacher in question, was delivering this sermon you will notice that when he referred to outstanding Christians he mentioned only Wilson and Bryan because he could not think of any Republicans to mention as being outstanding Christians. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. BURTON. Maybe. There are 12,000,000 of these people here; they are not the dominant race. What do your amendments mean to them? What does the promise of citizenship mean to them in large areas in this country? But they are here, and the more fortunate race should in every way provide for them just as far as possible. I urge that this appropriation be continued on the ground of humanity and because of that consideration which a stronger race should have for a less fortunate race.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to my colleague, the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. CARTER].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma is recognized for three minutes.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Speaker, the Senate amendment under consideration provides for maintenance, improvements, and so forth, of Howard University. Howard University is a privately owned negro school, having no connection with the Federal Government. I did not agree with the committee on the Howard University item. I disagreed not on account of any prejudice against the colored race but I disagreed for the reason that under the parliamentary practices of this House and this Congress the item has no place in this bill.

Mr. DYER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARTER. I will be very glad to yield.

Mr. DYER. This is the same item we have had for 40 years and more, and the gentleman never objected before.

Mr. CARTER. Oh, yes; I have objected year after year. And I will say to the gentleman that he had his antilynching bill brought up and passed last year, but that is no reason why it should come up again this year. [Laughter.]

I am opposed to this because, if we are going to appropriate this money for this school—and I am opposed to appropriating money for educating people without some specific cause—we should come in at the front door and not slip in at the back door with it. Why can not those gentlemen who favor this matter bring in some character of legislation which will authorize this thing and not make it subject to this contention and debate every time it is brought in? Now, gentlemen, if there are any politics in the proposition that is the politics of it. The politics is that gentlemen continue to do by indirection that which they refuse to do directly.

Now, my friends over on the majority side—the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] and other gentlemen favoring this item—have sufficient influence and power in this Congress to have legislation passed authorizing this appropriation so as to prevent this contention coming up every year. Why do not they do it? Why are we continually called upon to do the thing in this underhand way? Why are we called upon to slip in at the back door and spend all these thousands of dollars of the taxpayers' money when by the enactment of a very simple bill or resolution the item could be legalized if we are really sincere and earnest about the matter?

Mr. DOWELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARTER. Yes; I yield to my friend.

Mr. DOWELL. Is it not true that this committee is doing this same thing on every appropriation bill, and there are items coming in here from the Senate, under the rules, and the gentleman himself is favoring amendments that come here exactly as this one has come, and the gentleman has not made a single objection to them?

Mr. CARTER. I can not yield any further. I do not want the gentleman to take all my time. If the gentleman will just investigate beneath the surface, the gentleman will know that this is not done in connection with another institution under the Government. This is the only private institution for which we appropriate in this manner. With the exception of Indian schools there is not another educational institution in this entire Government where we appropriate gratuities from the Public Treasury for the support of schools. The only appropriation that is made as a gratuity for schools from the Federal Treasury is the appropriation for the Indian schools, and these Indian schools are the property of the Government. Those schools are provided upon the very reasonable and just ground that when the white man came to this country the Indian owned the entire continent and this great Republic has been carved out of his domain, and now that everything has been taken away from him, practically, the Federal Government feels, very justly, that it should look after his education and civilization in order that he might be merged into the body politic as individual units of its capable, self-sustaining citizens.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. CARTER. I yield.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. What about the Columbia Institution for the Deaf? The Government appropriates money for that.

Mr. CARTER. Yes; the Columbia Institution for the Deaf is appropriated for, but, if I mistake not, the Government owns a portion of that institution.

Mr. FOSTER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARTER. I yield.

Mr. FOSTER. I was not here under the last administration. Was this same appropriation made under the last administration?

Mr. CARTER. Yes; and through every administration that we have had, but that is not any reason why it should continue to go on, and my friend knows it is not.

Mr. FOSTER. I wonder whether the gentleman tried to stop it then.

Mr. CARTER. Yes; I dissented every time it came in here, just as I am doing now.

Mr. BUTLER. Has the gentleman spoken against it every time?

Mr. CARTER. No; I have only spoken against it once before, and that was in a Democratic administration, I will say to my good friend from Pennsylvania.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I will only take this one minute to agree with my colleague from Oklahoma that it is time there was legislation that would guard this institution against being crippled by a point of order. I do not think we should go to the extent of taking the institution over. I have given it some thought. I have contemplated, if no one else did, introducing a bill, and, if so, it would be to the effect that appropriations in aid of the institution should be authorized, the board of trustees appointed by the President or otherwise by the Government, a supervision by the Bureau of Education, and a fiscal inspection of its affairs by the Government. But the situation now is that custom has grown up here for 40 years carrying the appropriation in this way, and our committee was obliged to continue that custom in deference to the will of the House as manifested for 40 years, and it would be a grave injustice to discontinue it at this time.

Mr. VAILE. Will the gentleman yield? I just want to ask the gentleman from Oklahoma whether he would vote for such a bill?

Mr. CRAMTON. I hope so. He is a pretty reasonable gentleman.

Mr. CARTER. If I will do what?

Mr. VAILE. I was wondering if the gentleman would vote for such a bill.

Mr. CARTER. I did not hear the kind of bill it was to be.

Mr. CRAMTON. The gentleman from Oklahoma does not have as much confidence in me as I have in him. He wants to know what is in the bill.

Mr. Speaker, this institution is well managed. Doctor Durkee, the president, and Doctor Scott, the secretary, are capable men. It is economically administered and is doing a great work. Something has been said about irrigation for the Indians being a proper expenditure of our funds. That is only because they are wards of the Nation. The colored man is as well a ward of the Nation, and we are giving him in this university an opportunity to get an education that is not presented to him otherwise. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

Mr. BUTLER. I would like the gentleman before he does that to yield for a question.

Mr. CRAMTON. I yield for a question.

Mr. BUTLER. What will become of this institution if we withhold this appropriation?

Mr. CRAMTON. Well, I will say this, Mr. Speaker: Recently a fund was raised for the benefit of this institution, an endowment fund, and $5 out of $6 that was raised for its benefit over the whole Nation came from alumni of this institution. Where then were all these gentlemen from the South in whose midst most of these people live?

Mr. AYRES. I would like to ask my colleague a question.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I am obliged to move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. LUCE). The question now comes on the motion to recede and concur in the Senate amendment No. 58.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 209, nays 106, not voting 116, as follows:

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, as to amendment No. 60, it is merely a total and I move that the House recede and concur with an amendment inserting the correct total.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Michigan that the House recede and concur with the amendment suggested.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House ask for a further conference upon the matters in disagreement.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER appointed the following conferees: Mr. CRAMTON, Mr. MURPHY, and Mr. CARTER.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD with respect to this report by inserting therein a portion of a letter from the Reclamation Service bearing upon certain items affected by the report.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CRAMTON. The letter has to do with amendemnts 34 and 35 disposed of in the conference report, and is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
BUREAU OF RECLAMATION,
OFFICE OF THE COMMISSIONER,
Washington, D. C., March 3, 1924.

Hon. LOUIS C. CRAMTON,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. CRAMTON: Reference is made to your request over the telephone for the comments of this office on Senate amendments (34), (35), (37), and (38), to H. R. 5078, "An act making appropriations for the Department of the Interior for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1925, and for other purposes."

Regarding amendment (34) concerning the Yuma project, we believe the clause approved by the House was in proper form, and should be restored. The Yuma project consists of three divisions—the Reservation division in California and the Valley division and Mesa division in Arizona. The Reservation and Valley divisions are being developed under the general reclamation law, while the Mesa division is being developed under the special act of January 25, 1917 (39 Stat. 868). The Reservation division has no need for electric power and therefore the water users of that division are not interested in the construction of the plant. The Valley division must have power to pump its drainage water off the project land, and the Mesa division must have power to pump its irrigation water on the project land. Our plan is to build this plant for the Valley division and charge all of the lands of the Valley division with the cost, under section 4 of the extension act, which provides a well-understood procedure for that purpose. Because of the special act under which the Mesa division is being developed, the procedure under section 4 of the extension act can not be applied to that division, and the landowners would in effect be contractors for the power from the landowners of the Valley division. The amendment made by the Senate would require contracts covering the three divisions of the project which would be infeasible.

As to amendment (35), relating to the Boise project, the following paragraph retains the principle suggested by the paragraph inserted in the House, is believed to be thoroughly practicable, and is satisfactory to this bureau:

> "Provided further, That no part of the money appropriated under this paragraph shall be expended for the development of electric power until the Secretary of the Interior shall have secured, subject to the needs of the Boise project, a contract with the Gem irrigation district providing for the purchase by that district, for a period to be determined by the Secretary of the Interior, of the electric power necessary for the irrigation of the lands of said district: And provided further, That the rates in such contract shall be sufficient to include interest at 5 per cent per annum on the cost of such power development plus a reasonable depreciation on the power plant, as found by the Secretary of the Interior, and that the contract shall provide that before delivery of power in any season the district shall furnish security satisfactory to the Secretary of the Interior to insure payment to the Government of the power charges for such season, and that such contract shall be entered into only in the event that the holders of not less than 90 per cent of the face value of the bonded and warrant indebtedness of the district shall subordinate their claims to the obligations of the district to the Government under such contract: And provided further, That in the event power is furnished from the said power plant to more than one contractor, then the rates for power shall be fixed so that each such contractor, including said district, shall pay only its proper proportionate share of said interest and depreciation, as found by the Secretary of the Interior."

* * * * * * *

If the foregoing suggestions are in any respect not entirely clear, we shall be pleased to go into the matter further upon request.

Very truly yours,

D. W. DAVIS, Commissioner.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend the remarks which I made on this matter concerning Howard University.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

FIRST DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL, FISCAL YEAR 1924.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7449) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in certain appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1924, and prior fiscal years, to provide supplemental appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1924, and for other purposes. Pending that I ask unanimous consent that the time for general debate be equally divided between myself and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS], without now fixing any definite time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois, pending his motion to go into the Committee of the Whole, asks unanimous consent that general debate be controlled one-half by himself and one-half by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS]. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 7449.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 7449, with Mr. LEHLBACH in the chair.

The Clerk reported the title of the bill.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MADDEN. This bill is entitled the "First deficiency appropriation bill, fiscal year 1924." The amount recommended to be appropriated in the bill is $153,696,567.06, of which $112,586.98 is for the legislative branch, leaving $153,583,980.08 for the executive and judicial branches of the Government.

The amount recommended in the bill is $387,438.75 less than the total amount requested.

The total recommended in the bill divides itself logically into two classes of items, namely, appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year 1923 and prior fiscal years for obligations already incurred, and supplemental appropriations for the fiscal year 1924 for purposes for which no appropriation was made and rendered necessary because of the enactment of a new law or arising out of a situation which could not be foreseen when the regular bills were enacted.

The amounts provided in the bill for the fiscal year 1923 and prior fiscal years are $116,608,367.54, and those amounts are composed principally of the following items:

There is for the Veterans' Bureau, for vocational rehabilitation, $900,000. It seems that in the contract obligations of the Government for vocational training there is estimated to be more than $2,000,000 of obligations outstanding, but only $900,000 of those obligations have been submitted to Congress.

There is an item of $46,653 for the Housing Corporation for the payment of ground rents, and another item for 1924 for the same purpose. This is due to the fact that during the war the Government found difficulty in getting employees and having facilities supplied where they could live. Under the authority granted to the President a great number of buildings were constructed on the ground adjacent to the Union Station Plaza, and these dormitories have been occupied by the employees of the Government ever since. The ground occupied by many of these buildings is owned by the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad. During the war we were able to get the use of the land for the payment of the taxes, which amounted to about $13,000 each year.

Mr. YATES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. YATES. The gentleman says that many of those buildings are on land owned by the Baltimore & Ohio?

Mr. MADDEN. That is true; but not all of them are.

Mr. YATES. Does the Government own some of that property there?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes; and we did intend to own it all. Recently, however, the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co. said that they wanted to use their own ground and requested us to get off. In the event that we would not do that, they wanted us to pay interest upon the value of the ground. They estimated the value at $2,000,000. They wanted 6 per cent upon that amount for rent. The Secretary of Labor and the Housing Corporation finally entered into a tentative agreement to pay 6 per cent on the assessed valuation, which is $1,000,000, and in addition to the 6 per cent to pay the taxes. For part of the fiscal year 1923—November 14, 1922, to June 30, 1923—under that arrangement there was due $46,643, which is provided for in this bill. The amount for the fiscal year 1924 is $74,315.

We have in the bill an item of $40,000 for 1923 and $260,000 for 1924 for the payment of fees of examining surgeons in pension cases. The payment of the fees of examining surgeons is due to examinations made of Civil War and other war veterans in connection with applications for pensions under the Pension Bureau.

Mr. MORTON D. HULL. Will the gentleman yield for a question in reference to the rent item?

Mr. MADDEN. I will.

Mr. MORTON D. HULL. Were leases made of this ground from the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad?

Mr. MADDEN. A lease was made but has expired. We are simply doing the best we can until we can make other arrangements. We either have to pay or get off.

Mr. MORTON D. HULL. Then there is no permanent period of time?

Mr. MADDEN. No; the policy should be to tear down the buildings as soon as possible, but until they are torn down or closed up we must pay rent.

We have under the Department of Justice for the expenses of United States Courts and support of prisoners items amounting to $140,032.36. Now, those items are for the year 1923 or prior years, deficiencies which have been incurred for work done or supplies furnished. The amount covers the maintenance of prisoners, fees of commissioners, expenses of marshals, district attorneys, and so forth. The United States courts all over the land convict and send prisoners to jail, and being Federal prisoners we have to pay the rate the local authorities charge for the support and maintenance of those prisoners either before convicted or after. Nobody knows how many are to be sent to jail or how long they will stay there, so nobody can estimate the expense in advance.

Then for the Post Office Department for 1923 we have an item of $3,774,433.40. I will explain that item, which is a large one, a little later on. Now, for the customs service there is an item of $60,000 for refunding internal-revenue taxes, $105,467,000; public buildings, operating supplies, $105,000; judgments, United States courts, $3,097,866.07; judgments, Court of Claims, $1,439,805.93, and claims audited and allowed by the general accounting office, $1,458,297.00. Aside from the amount in the foregoing list for refunding taxes, the items in the main represent actual deficiencies incurred in 1923 and prior fiscal years and for which no payment has been made.

The amount of $105,467,000 for refunding taxes illegally collected covers refunds on taxes collected from the fiscal year 1917 to the fiscal year 1924. While the appropriation is available for refunds on account of taxes illegally collected during any year up to and including the fiscal year 1924, as a matter of actual operation it will apply principally to the years prior to the fiscal year 1921 and the amount used on account of the fiscal year 1924 will be negligible. The sum recommended represents in part actual claims approved and awaiting payment and in part is an anticipation of the number that will be approved for payment from among the claims filed and awaiting audit and adjustment. Approximately 47,207 claims involving $22,380,000 have been approved and await payment. The remainder of the amount recommended is for payment of claims which it is anticipated will be approved between now and December 31, 1924.

The average monthly rate of expenditure for refunds is approximately $10,000,000. It is impossible to predict accurately in advance the exact situation that will exist. While the amounts required for the repayment of taxes are large, and arise from the collection in fiscal years when the tax receipts were unusually heavy, it must be kept in mind that the Government is recovering considerable additional revenue as the result of audits and investigations of schedules where underpayments have been made. It is estimated that the amount of additional revenue of this character which will be received during the fiscal year 1924 will be $250,000,000. This is the net figure of additional revenue, after deducting from the gross sum estimated from additional assessments and collections the amount that will be refunded.

Mr. WHITE of Kansas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. WHITE of Kansas. I do not understand, and if the gentleman has the information I would like to know, in what manner and how it comes that $105,000,000 is to be refunded. Can the gentleman tell us?

Mr. MADDEN. I will be glad to do so.

Mr. WHITE of Kansas. I want to make this qualification to the question: Is it generally on account of an erroneous assessment, a misconception, or to some extent due to regulations which upon investigation are not borne out by the law?

Mr. MADDEN. When we began the collection of income taxes under the income tax law at the time of the war, the rates were heavy and the law was little understood, and everybody made a schedule with some great doubt as to the accuracy of the schedule. Many people contested the validity of the assessment of certain sections of the law, and the courts were called upon to construe the constitutionality of the act in many phases, and the courts have ruled as to the unconstitutionality of many of the elements in connection with the revenue act.

Mr. WHITE of Kansas. That is the main question.

Mr. MADDEN. State taxes and capital-stock taxes, and many other taxes and collections in a very large sum have been made, and the large refunds we are called upon to make are due either to a change in the regulations in the department or to court decisions or to errors found in the schedules under a later audit. There were no audits made of any schedules filed under any taxes paid from 1917 until about 1921, that being due to the fact the pressure was very great on the department which had not time more than to collect and record during the war, and sometime after the war. There is nobody to blame, and while we asked the question, as the gentleman from Kansas properly does——

Mr. WHITE of Kansas. I think the gentleman answered the question——

Mr. MADDEN. We asked the question, as the gentleman from Kansas properly does, Why do we pay these refunds or are called upon to repay them? I want to call attention to the fact that we are paying these refunds for taxes overpaid, and the same audits that discover the need for refund also discover the reason why we should make a new assessment on underpaid assessments.

While we have already paid from 1917 to September, 1923, $262,000,000 on refunds, we have collected as the result of the audit on underpaid schedules about $2,000,000,000. Of course, the Members of the House and the public generally do not realize that we do not have to come to the House to get authority to collect; we only come to the House to get authority to pay back what has already been collected.

Mr. MORTON D. HULL. What is the expense of that audit?

Mr. MADDEN. The expense of that audit is large. About two years ago the Treasury Department came before the Committee on Appropriations and said to us in substance, "If you will give us $10,000,000 to employ expert auditors, we will agree to collect $500,000,000 per year on underpaid schedules." We went carefully into the question, and we were convinced that the investment of $10,000,000 would be a good investment; and we have proved the wisdom of the investment, because in the year in which we first made the appropriation they collected $450,000,000 from underpaid schedules, and last year they collected $462,000,000 from that source on income taxes alone and $62,764,000 on estate taxes and $7,777,000 from capital-stock taxes; that is, taxes that should have been collected on capital stock issued. They sent their auditors to the offices of the secretaries of state of the different States and found that those companies or corporations that had organized had not reported. Yet, more than that, they have been collecting $5,000,000 a month for quite a long time back, or $60,000,000 a year as a result of investigations in the field from people who had never made any tax return at all since the war began, and the auditors have gone into the field and discovered the reason why people have not made returns. They are now making returns and paying their taxes, and that tax amounts to $60,000,000 a year.

Mr. HOCH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. HOCH. Does the interest payable to these claimants begin at once?

Mr. MADDEN. It begins on the adjudication of the claims and continues until the payment.

Mr. HOCH. This is the first appropriation we have had for that purpose?

Mr. MADDEN. This is the first appropriation we have had this session, but it is only fair to say that we have had this appropriation waiting for two weeks and clamoring for an opportunity to present it to the House every day, and this is the first day we have had a chance. It has not been the fault of the committee. And I may say for the information of the House, that all the appropriation bills for next year for the proper conduct of the Government, except two, are now ready for consideration, so far as the Committee on Appropriations is concerned, and if you do not pass them early it will not be our fault. [Applause.]

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I read yesterday—it is a matter of common knowledge, I suppose—that the refunds for the last year were approximately $124,000,000.

Mr. MADDEN. That is true, because I know we made several large appropriations.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. If a man presents a claim that he has paid more taxes than he ought to have paid, then it is taken up. That is true?

Mr. MADDEN. It is not necessary. But that is one of the procedures. It is possible to have that procedure. When a man files his schedule and the audit takes place, if the department discovers that he has overpaid, they would include that overpayment on the record and notify him. If, however, they did not do that and a man thought he had a rebate coming to him, he could make his application.

They have five different sections in the Bureau of Internal Revenue in which this work is done. I can not give you the technical titles that are used for those sections, but the application for refund is filed with the proper section. No man knows what section is going to deal with his schedule. When the bureau makes the record it goes up to the auditing section, which can either modify, reject, or approve. If it rejects or modifies, it goes back, and the man who made the first audit may not get the papers to make the second audit; probably not. Then it comes back to the chief of the section; and when he gets through with it, it goes to another section, and the men in the other section have no knowledge as to the men who handled it in the first section; and when they get through with it in the second section, it goes to the third section; and when the third section gets through with it, it goes to the fourth section; and finally, if it is more than $50,000 in amount, it goes to the solicitor of the bureau, and he passes on the facts, and then it goes to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, who can finally approve or disapprove, as the case may be. If he approves, of course it then goes to the place of payment. That is the process through which they go.

I have been very solicitous about this thing, because I have always been afraid that there might be some collusion somewhere. It has been frequently charged that collusion existed; that conspiracy existed; and that as the result of this collusion or these conspiracies, or both, the Government had been defrauded in the allowance of claims for refunds. I have gone into that very carefully, and have been told by the responsible authorities in the department that they have their intelligence agents watching carefully every man who acts upon any one of these cases.

They have had reason to suspect certain men at certain times, and they have in fact been able to discover fraud in some cases, and perhaps in more than one or two cases, but in each case they have arrested the perpetrators of the fraud; they have indicted them, tried them, convicted them, and they are now under sentence. There might be cases pending now that I do not know anything about. I have frequently suggested that we ought to put more safeguards around this matter, but they say the only thing you can do is what they are doing, unless you want to have interminable delay, and, as the gentleman knows, many people are now complaining about the delay being longer than it should be.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. That is a very lucid explanation of the present procedure. The reason I asked the question, primarily, was because this morning I received a communication saying that a certain quite influential firm had simply signed its name, or, rather, indorsed in writing its approval of an application for the rehearing of a case which had been indorsed as closed by the department, and having that indorsement, and doing virtually nothing else, that firm received $20,000.

Mr. MADDEN. I may say, if the gentleman will permit, that while this bill was under consideration we had a case which I suspected myself. I sent for the responsible Treasury officials and I asked them about it. It was a case where a man had $50,000 tied up in the court, or his estate was tied up to pay a bill of one of these so-called tax-adjusting concerns. I asked if it were possible for such a thing as that to happen, and they said it was, and they said it frequently happened like this: Somebody would discover in some way and tell somebody else that a certain claim was about to be audited for payment. Perhaps somebody in the audit section would have a friend among these tax adjusters—I do not know—and they would tell them this case had been favorably passed upon.

They would go to the concern in whose favor the adjustment had been made and get them to sign a contract allowing them to make the adjustment, and all they would have to do would be to get the contract signed and collect their commission. This was a case where a man collected $50,000 and had nothing to do with the claim except to get the contract signed and collect the money.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois whether he does not think that a secret procedure like that, which results in the taking of great sums of money from the Treasury of the United States, is not only wrong in theory but in practice? If a man has a claim against the Treasury of the United States, ordinarily he has to go to the Court of Claims. That court, in open session, hears the witnesses for and the witnesses against the claim, and listens to lawyers upon each side. But here is a man who presents a claim upon the Treasury of the United States and goes when he pleases and where he pleases to one official; it is in his office and nobody knows anything about it or pays any attention to it, at least, the public does not know anything about it. Then this man shunts him off to some other office and the case is considered there in the quiet of the office and alone, and then it may be the man is shunted to some other office. Meanwhile the public is absolutely uninformed as to the filing of the claim, as to what the testimony is and knows nothing about it. It is in effect this: The taking, after a hearing in secret, of money by the millions from the Treasury of the United States. The gentleman says it might cause delay to have any other sort of procedure.

Mr. MADDEN. I say that is what they said.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. But I remind the gentleman of a saying of Blackstone's, which is familiar to all lawyers, that the delays in administration of justice are the price we pay for our liberties in greater things. I think we can well afford to have a little delay in the hearing of a claim for $5,000,000, $6,000,000, or $10,000,000 rather than to have that much money go out of the Treasury simply on a private understanding.

Mr. MADDEN. I think the gentleman is quite right, and that there ought to be the fullest inquiry into every one of those cases.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Does not the gentleman think that a claim of that kind should not be considered by a secret tribunal but that the fact of the filling of such a claim should be public, so that the public and those who know the man filing the claim can be informed about it?

Mr. MADDEN. Are not all of these claims public?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. And that there should be a hearing in public?

Mr. MADDEN. Well, I can not say about that.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. And that an opportunity should be given for people to be heard for and against it.

Mr. MADDEN. I do not think you would ever get through with the work if that procedure were followed. Let me read this from the hearings and then I would like to ask the gentleman from Wisconsin a question:

> I might also call to your attention the fact that court decisions are continually being rendered on disputed points which make it necessary for the Internal Revenue Bureau to refund large amounts of taxes that have previously been paid. For instance, the Supreme Court decision in the case of Eisner v. Macomber, holding that a stock dividend declared by a corporation is not income to the stockholder, resulted in refunds of $70,000,000. The Supreme Court decision in the case of Shwab v. Doyle, holding that transfers in contemplation of death made prior to the passage of the revenue act of 1916 are not part of the gross estate of a decedent and are not subject to the estate tax imposed by that act, resulted in the refunding of about $18,000,000. During the past two years there have been rendered at least 20 other court decisions affecting taxes already collected. These decisions will ultimately result in refunds aggregating over $50,000,000.

Now, how would the gentleman require applications for a refund of those taxes to be made? Would the gentleman compel them to go through a court procedure?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. My own judgment is that no money should be taken out of the Treasury of the United States upon the filing of a claim unless there has been an adjudication by a court, in open session, or by some tribunal equivalent to a court, whose sessions would be public. There should be an announcement in advance that the case is to be heard and there should be a calendar of cases. In other words, there should be no secrecy in the matter of taking money out of the Public Treasury.

Mr. MAPES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. MAPES. The gentleman has given us two steps that are taken in the way of securing refunds. My attention was called in the last few days to a case like this. The gentleman has been talking about cases involving millions and this is a small case as compared to those, but I think it illustrates the system. A company filed its return for 1917, 1918, and 1919, and for other years and a Government auditor came along in 1921 and found, according to his audit, that the company owed something over $15,000 for those years. The company made an application for a refund, and another Government auditor came along in 1923, audited the company's books, and made his report to the department. Afterwards the company sent its own auditor to the department and went over the case with the income-tax unit here in Washington. Subsequent to that, the department found, and so wrote the company, that instead of its owing $15,000, the Government owed the company something; not a large amount, $500 or $600, as I recall it.

That stood until a short time ago, when the company was visited by another Government agent, who said that the second auditor was not satisfied with that finding, and therefore, under the regulations of the department, he wanted to go over the books of this company again. The company has already been put to about $4,500 expense in the case, and of course it is difficult to justify that sort of procedure to the citizen involved.

Mr. MADDEN. Here is what sometimes happens. These audits are a good deal more of a terror than most people think. For example, a revenue agent will be sent out in the field, and these agents are not under the control of the local collector of internal revenue. Their orders come from Washington. They are sent out to check up the accounts of a given concern. In checking up these accounts they frequently discover that some large transaction involving a large sum of money between this company and another company whose accounts they are not auditing has taken place and that no report of that transaction has been made in connection with the return. So they follow that up. When they make the audit of the second man's books, which audit they were not intending to make at all and would not have made except for the first discovery, they come back and make a reaudit of the books of the first man, and perhaps in the reaudit they discover that another transaction in connection with some other business concern has not been disclosed in the return, and that is why these audits and reaudits are frequently required to be made in order that they may trace down the frauds that may exist in connection with the making of returns.

Mr. MAPES. I will say to the gentleman that in this particular case I do not think there was any question of that kind involved. It was probably due to poor bookkeeping.

Mr. MADDEN. Or lack of knowledge.

Mr. MAPES. Lack of bookkeeping. I would like to ask the gentleman, if he knows, how many times the Government can go over the same case?

Mr. MADDEN. They can go over them whenever they have reason to suspect there is anything wrong, and they never fix a limit on the number of times they can go over them within the period which the law prescribes; that is, within the statute of limitations.

Mr. MAPES. So the taxpayer does not know whether his case is settled or not.

Mr. MADDEN. No; if he is under suspicion in any way; but if a man has been proved to be correct in his habit of making returns, there is not much chance of his having this trouble after the first audit.

Mr. MAPES. It is not a question of being under suspicion, if the gentleman means to infer any desire to escape the taxation; but it may be a question of poor bookkeeping or something of that kind.

Mr. MADDEN. Of course, that may be.

Mr. MAPES. Can these auditors go——

Mr. MADDEN. They do not go except as they are sent. They never go anywhere except on orders.

Mr. MAPES. Can they be sent indefinitely?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes; here is what they do——

Mr. MAPES. And the taxpayer has no redress but to hire another auditor to check up on the Government auditor.

Mr. MADDEN. He has no redress and will not have any as long as the income tax law is in effect. The Government is a partner of every citizen of the United States in all his earnings. The Government is not a partner in the capital that the person employs in his business, and the Government does not supply any part of the capital to make up any loss, but the Government insists on the collection of the last cent of its interest in the business, and whenever a responsible official of the Treasury Department has reason to believe that there is anything wrong with anybody's account or with anybody's return he is authorized to send an agent. The agent does not go from the collector of internal revenue. The collector of internal revenue has nothing to do with him and can not order him. He goes with a special mandate, and he can only audit the things for which he has such mandate. Then he makes his return, and if his return shows there ought to be a further audit somebody else will get a new mandate to make the further discoveries that are required to be made.

Mr. MAPES. Of course that is a great expense and works a great hardship in individual cases.

Mr. MADDEN. It is a great annoyance, but it is like a lot of other things we have in connection with the enforcement of the law, and of course, unfortunately, it does create a lot of annoyance to those who have to pay the tax and have to put up with the inconvenience.

Mr. ROACH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. ROACH. I merely want to submit a question to ascertain whether I correctly understand the gentleman's statement which he made a moment ago.

Mr. MADDEN. Maybe I did not make it quite clear.

Mr. ROACH. If I understand the gentleman correctly, if it is discovered in the department that a taxpayer has overpaid his taxes and has an account against the Government, whether due to a court decision to which the gentleman has referred, or brought to the attention of the department in some other way, it is the policy of the department to pay that taxpayer the refund that is due him without any proceeding whatsoever on his part.

Mr. MADDEN. Without any legal proceeding; yes.

Mr. ROACH. Is it necessary for the taxpayer to file a claim?

Mr. MADDEN. Oh, yes. If he files a claim he must file proof. He must prove his case beyond question.

Mr. ROACH. Let us say that I am a taxpayer and have overpaid my taxes by reason of a wrong construction placed upon the law by the bureau. Suppose the court reverses that construction and says that the tax should not have been paid. Therefore, a sum of money becomes due to me as a taxpayer.

Mr. MADDEN. In that case I think it would be sent as a credit to the collector of the internal revenue district in which the gentleman lives.

Mr. ROACH. That is as I think it should be, and if the gentleman will permit a reply in regard to what the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] said about having some public forum in which to hear these cases, a large percentage of these overpayments are due to the fact that the courts have placed a different construction upon the law to that which was placed on it by the Treasury officials in their regulations.

Mr. MADDEN. The refunds amount to more than $100,000,000 on account of court decisions.

Mr. ROACH. It seems to me it would be unjust to require the taxpayer to be under the burden of asserting and presenting his claim with all the red tape incident to such transactions, and it would be rather the duty of the department, as they are now operating, to pay these claims voluntarily.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. In reply to what the gentleman has said, there are many claims which are not of the character he describes. Take the other claims where the man himself thinks that he has been wronged and he initiates a claim himself. It is not based upon a subsequent or a different interpretation by the court of the law, and the adjudication of that claim ought to be in some open tribunal where the public will have the information.

Mr. MADDEN. That is in the case of a contested claim.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Yes.

Mr. ROACH. Just one other question, because I would like to get the matter entirely clear, for to me it seems very important. Will the committee to which the gentleman has referred, for which an appropriation was made, investigate returns with the view of ascertaining underpayments as well as overpayments?

Mr. MADDEN. They all come in together. When the audit of schedules is being made they discover whether there has been an over or an under payment, and they report the cases. A man may make a claim for a refund, and the audit of his claim may show that he owes the Government. That frequently happens. In that case the Government levies a new assessment and collects it instead of paying him the refund that he claims. The best test of that is that while we have been paying out $262,000,000 since the beginning of the war on refunds, we have collected over $2,000,000,000 on underpaid schedules, so that as a matter of fact I think it is fair to give the department credit for a very accurate system in connection with the consideration of these problems.

A good deal of complaint has been made about the condition of the Ellis Island immigration station. A great many people have said that the Ellis Island station is a menace and a disgrace to civilization. I have not been willing to go as far as that, but I really do think that the Ellis Island immigration station was and is in bad condition, and all of the members of the Immigration Committee who visited the station say that something should be done. This committee recommends an appropriation of $326,000 for repairs and alterations at Ellis Island immigration station. That is for the purpose of remodeling the buildings and furnishing beds where no beds have heretofore existed for those who have to be detained. Under the existing immigration law, where the quota of the different nationalities is restricted, a great many more people are held at Ellis Island than were held prior to the restricted provisions of the law. A great many people are held there who are really not immigrants in the sense we generally understand the term. They are held because the quota from the country from which they come has already been filled, or, at any rate, there is a contest as to whether it is filled or not.

Mr. WHITE of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. WHITE of Kansas. Is it not a fact in the particular instance cited by the chairman that those who are not immigrants are held in order that they may submit proofs?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. WHITE of Kansas. And it is very largely their own fault.

Mr. MADDEN. I do not know whose fault it is.

Mr. WHITE of Kansas. It is undoubtedly, in most instances.

Mr. MADDEN. Of course, there is not any argument to be made on that. I am simply calling attention to the fact that they are held there. Why they are held does not matter. The fact that they are held makes it necessary to make some provision for their care.

Mr. CELLER. And is it not a fact that the Immigration Service more than pays for itself?

Mr. MADDEN. Oh, there is no question about that.

Mr. CELLER. The amount of money received is more than the amount expended.

Mr. MADDEN. Yes; but, after all, the mere fact that we get money from some source is not an argument for spending a lot more money in connection with the service.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. SNYDER. I spent an entire day at Ellis Island last fall. On that day there happened to be about 1,000 immigrants there who had been ordered deported. That night something like over 700 had to be sent off the island back onto the various ships on which they came over in in order to be housed overnight. I think at that time there were only three hundred and odd actual beds in the institution. The rest of them were wire contraptions—two or three deckers.

Mr. MADDEN. We are doing away with all of those now.

Mr. SNYDER. I think if there ever was an appropriation needed for the improvement of a situation this is it.

I think it goes a little bit further than the furnishing of beds and a rearrangement. I think it would be tremendously beneficial.

Mr. MADDEN. It is furnishing of much better sanitary facilities at Ellis Island, and so forth.

Mr. CELLER. Was this the amount asked for by the commissioner?

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Was there anything in the testimony in reference to any additional facilities to the extent of added buildings?

Mr. MADDEN. No; it is a remodeling of existing buildings.

Mr. SNYDER. But the gentleman does not mean to say that this is all that they asked for in the matter of a deficiency? Did not they have an idea——

Mr. MADDEN. Oh, they have plans, but those plans were not before us.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. I did not know but what it came up incidentally in this examination. I know they have recently reported——

Mr. MADDEN. They have other plans, but they ought to know them a little better than this plan before they present them.

Mr. SNYDER. I believe it is a great assistance for them to get this much.

Mr. HILL of Maryland. This has in contemplation the existing buildings?

Mr. MADDEN. Remodeling the existing buildings for the care of the immigrants who have to be detained overnight or for any particular length of time and to furnish them with rooms and better toilet facilities, sleeping facilities. In other words, to try to make the conditions more humane.

Mr. HILL of Maryland. At the utmost how many will these additions take care of?

Mr. MADDEN. Of everything they want; I do not know how many people.

Mr. SNYDER. They can not take care of over 1,500 or 1,600.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. I do not want to take up all day.

Mr. RAKER. I want to ask the gentleman if it is not a fact that as to all those that exceed the quota should the immigrant officials follow strictly the letter of the law that none of these people would be at Ellis Island?

Mr. MADDEN. They would have to stay on board ship.

Mr. RAKER. I mean before they left the ship they came over on.

Mr. MADDEN. I do not want to enter into a technical argument as to what ought not or what should be done, but I am simply calling attention to the conditions which exist and which we are trying to remedy at Ellis Island. You gentlemen of the Immigration Committee can argue that out a little later.

Mr. RAKER. I know, but these people are asked to land at Ellis Island.

Mr. MADDEN. No; they ask.

Mr. RAKER. But if the law was strictly enforced relative to excessive quota they would not be at Ellis Island but on the ship that brought them over.

Mr. MADDEN. I am not an expert, and I know the gentleman from California is.

Mr. RAKER. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. CELLER. The fault is not with the alien coming here, but with the existing conditions at Ellis Island.

Mr. MADDEN. We have no argument about that.

Mr. BOX. I want to say as a member of the committee, I think this appropriation is fully justified, the accommodations have not been sufficient or creditable to the United States, and I am glad this money is to be provided for this purpose.

Mr. MADDEN. I want to call attention to the additional appropriation of more than $11,000,000 for the Post Office Department for the fiscal year 1924 and to say it is due to a progressive condition of business which became apparent about the time Congress adjourned in March, 1923, for the long recess. The appropriations for the fiscal year 1924 had been made in the act approved February 14, 1923. The amounts appropriated by Congress for that fiscal year for the items for which supplemental amounts are carried in this bill were practically the amounts requested by the department. No complaint could properly be filed against the Appropriations Committee in reference to the appropriations at that time, and the department itself acknowledges the fact that they were given all the money they asked for, but the percentage of increase in postal receipts for the fiscal year 1922 was 4.61, and for the fiscal year 1923 it was 9.89. That is the increase in the business. It became apparent to the Post Office Department after a survey of the conditions of handling the mail throughout the country that the increase in personnel asked and provided for the fiscal year 1924 would not be sufficient. It therefore became necessary to employ additional help to handle the growing business and to dispose of congestion and to eliminate delays which had occurred in many places. The additional personnel, the greater portion of which was employed October 1 last, consisted of 3,200 clerks and employees of the first and second class offices, 500 post-office laborers, and 2,788 city letter carriers. The amounts recommended in the bill for 1924 are substantially all on account of these additional employments. It is only fair to say that while the business of the Post Office increased about 7½ per cent, the increase in expenses was only about 2½ per cent; that is to say, they have not taken advantage of its service and employed the number of men required to perform the increased business in the year before, and they only increased the expense 1½ per cent, while the business of the office increased about 7 per cent, and it became manifest on every hand that if they did not increase the number of people who ought to be employed to as large an extent as the business of the office justified they would then find themselves in an embarrassing situation and have to put those men on while Congress was out of session and take their chances on getting a deficiency appropriation which is carried in this bill amounting to $11,000,000.

Now we have a condition in respect to the circulating medium of the country which is very unusual. We authorized 138,000,000 sheets of currency to be printed last year. A sheet of currency is composed of four notes. We had authorized 138,000,000 sheets; and by the way, all the currency paper that is purchased is authorized through recommendations of the Committee on Appropriations, ratified by Congress from year to year, and the amount depends entirely upon the size of the circulation. Well, it soon transpired that there was not anything like the number of one-dollar bills throughout the country that were needed, and an unprecedented demand was made upon the Treasury for one-dollar bills, and the result was that they have had to go on, regardless of what we had been doing in the past and what we had authorized, and purchase at the rate of 165,000,000 sheets. There is about 5 per cent waste in this, as I understand, so that in 165,000,000 sheets there would be about 8,000,000 sheets wasted, and it requires 27,000,000 sheets in addition to what they had the money to buy, not only to buy the paper but to print and make it into currency; and meanwhile, because of the great demand for one-dollar bills—and this demand is greater than was ever known before—silver has ceased to circulate as a trading medium, and that makes the unusual demand for the one-dollar paper bill.

Before the war all the currency was printed on linen paper; that is, paper made of linen. During the war we had to go to cotton. Then we went to about half linen and half cotton. This year, for the first time since the war, we have been able to get back to all linen. Of course the currency lasts longer when made of linen than when made of cotton. There was a time when they used to launder or wash the money. They do not do that any more. They say it does not pay and that it draws out the lines on the paper, thus making counterfeiting easier. And so, to obviate counterfeiting to the extent that it can be obviated, they have ceased to launder the money.

Now, we have a great service known as the customs service. That service collected $562,000,000 last year. That is about $205,000,000 more than the service ever collected in any one year before. The number of employees in the service was insufficient to meet the needs of the service and to collect the revenue; and unless you could make proper inspection of goods coming in from foreign ports to American ports you naturally are not going to collect all the revenue, and it was necessary to ask for more men and more money.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has consumed an hour.

Mr. MADDEN. I will take 15 minutes more.

In the bill that we passed for the Treasury Department, which becomes effective on the 1st of July, we authorize 1,128 additional men for the customs service. We did not increase the compensation of any of these men because no increase in compensation was asked. I think I should say at this time that a good deal of pressure has been brought to bear for increased compensation for the customs-service employees throughout the country. But they did not come before our committee to ask for increased compensation while we had the annual bill under consideration. They asked us for 1,128 additional men, which cost in the neighborhood of $1,500,000 more than the expenses were for the year previous. That was all allowed. But since the bill went to the Senate a good many people have pressed for amendments over there, and I think amendments have been added to the bill which contemplate increased compensation.

I am saying this publicly because I know a good many Members of the House are interested. It is only right for me to say that I am in sympathy with these men in their demands for higher compensation. But Congress a little more than a year ago enacted what is known as the classification law, and that law provides that as to Government employees within the District of Columbia the classification shall take effect as of the first of next July, and the salaries that are fixed in the classification act are being appropriated for in these bills as they are presented for your consideration for all the Government employees in the District of Columbia. The law provides that the Classification Board shall make a report later on in connection with the Government employees in the field—that is, those employees that are not within the District of Columbia. I hope that that report will be made before the 1st of July so that whatever increase is to be given to the field service will be reported before the 1st of July, so that we can appropriate by supplemental appropriation bills to cover it.

There is no added compensation in any of the bills that we are reporting here for any Government employee outside of the District of Columbia—you want to get that—beginning on the 1st of July. The people in the customs service have been bringing a very great amount of pressure to bear for increased compensation now, and I say to those people who are bringing this pressure that they are not any more worthy than the people engaged in any other branch of the Government service; not a bit. They are equally worthy. I am saying what I am saying here publicly so that everybody will understand it. It would not be right toward the other 150,000 people engaged in the Government service if we gave first consideration to those engaged in the customs service and left out the other 150,000.

I want to say to all the anxious inquirers—and there are many of them—if they will just let their friends on the Committee on Appropriations alone, in connection with their customs service friends, we will try to do this: The appropriations we are making go into effect on the 1st of July. Any appropriations that go into any bill now for the customs service would not become effective until the 1st of July anyway unless it were a deficiency bill.

If the Classification Board has not succeeded in classifying the field service, which includes all Government employees and not merely those in the customs service—because there are only 7,500 people in the customs service in the field and 150,000 of the others, excluding the Postal Service—we will recommend before the 1st of July the present base pay to all Government employees in the field, the existing bonus and whatever addition may be required to these two items to bring the compensation of those engaged in the field service up to the compensation of the people living and working in the District of Columbia as fixed in the classification act. That will put them all on a parity. [Applause.] It will not give anybody any preference; it will be just to everybody and no preferential rights will be granted anywhere.

If there is anybody in the customs service who does not like that, they need not apply to me, because I am not for any preferential rights. [Applause.] So tell your friends that is where I stand, and that to the extent I can stop you from doing anything else I am going to do it.

Now, we have another item which is very important—the Coast Guard item, the service about which you heard so much yesterday. We are asking here an appropriation for the Coast Guard of $13,850,622.

Yesterday you passed a bill which authorizes the transfer of 20 torpedo-boat destroyers from the Navy to the Coast Guard. Among other things it was said that the Coast Guard might become corrupt. I think somebody said that if they were charged with the responsibility of enforcing the prohibition act they might become corrupt, but there is no danger of that, because the Coast Guard men are incorruptible; they are the highest class of men we have in any Government service.

Yesterday you authorized the transfer of 20 ships from the Navy to the Coast Guard. The reason why these boats were transferred was because they have a 30-knot speed, while the existing Coast Guard fleet has a speed of about 10 knots.

The Coast Guard is charged with the responsibility of preventing smuggling; they are an arm of the Treasury Department to help collect the revenue which belongs to the United States; they are the sea police force of the Treasury Department; they are the instrumentality through which the law is enforced at sea, lives saved, and many other meritorious things are done by that service. They are an incorruptible, patriotic, untiring, and indefatigable lot, worthy of the confidence of the American people. To place in their hands law enforcement in connection with the smuggling of liquor is, I believe, one of the wisest things that has been undertaken here.

Yesterday we talked about 20 destroyers and, perhaps, most men thought that was all the fleet was to be, in addition to two mine sweepers. But that is not all. That bill only provided for the transfer of 20 of these boats, and it was not necessary to carry anything else in that legislation, because the Appropriations Committee has the power to provide the other means. That committee can not make transfers, but it can provide the motor boats and other equipment. We are providing in this bill for 323 new motor boats—223 cabin cruisers with great speed, to cost about $37,500 apiece, as well as a lot of dory boats, about 30 or 40 feet long, and with plenty of power and great speed. There will be 100 of them if you agree with us, and there will also be the 20 torpedo-boat destroyers. They will have guns, if anybody asks you, and they will have authority to enforce the law.

Somebody has said you can not capture a ship sailing under a foreign flag if it is at sea, but the fact is you can if it comes within American waters and then starts to go to sea again if you can make the chase continuous, and the nation whose flag she is flying can not contest it. That is what it is intended these fast boats will do.

What is the trouble to-day? The trouble to-day is that we have fleets of ships—not a fleet of ships—carrying thousands of cases of contraband liquor which they are able to land because our present facilities are inadequate to prevent it.

Now, gentlemen, I did not vote for prohibition; but it does not matter. I am for law enforcement. [Applause.] And there will not be anything I can do as a Member of Congress to enforce the law that I will not do, no matter what it costs. [Applause.]

Mr. SCHNEIDER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. SCHNEIDER. Does this appropriation provide for additional life-saving stations and the personnel therefor?

Mr. MADDEN. No; not for additional life-saving stations. It provides for the reinstallation of some that already existed. There are some 19 of them which have been discontinued and are to be restored, but, of course, there is no need of going into the details of that now.

Mr. SCHNEIDER. Was there not some authorization for the construction of life-saving stations made by the past Congress?

Mr. MADDEN. There may have been. I do not recall.

Mr. SCHNEIDER. I think so. Does this appropriation provide for carrying out that authorization?

Mr. MADDEN. No. If it was to be done at all, it would be done in the appropriation bill of last year.

Mr. SCHNEIDER. It was not done last year.

Mr. MADDEN. They may not have done the work; but if there is any provision made, it would have been appropriated for at that time. I would not undertake to say now, but I will look that up and let the gentleman know.

Mr. CELLER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes, indeed.

Mr. CELLER. I was interested in the gentleman's statement when he said he would be willing to expend every dollar in the Treasury for law enforcement.

Mr. MADDEN. If it was necessary.

Mr. CELLER. Suppose we had to spend $2,000,000,000 for the enforcement of prohibition?

Mr. MADDEN. I do not differentiate between laws. I would simply enforce the law.

Mr. CELLER. Would the gentleman not rather see prohibition done away with than to have to expend such a large amount of money to enforce it?

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman can not put those words into my mouth. [Applause.]

Mr. CELLER. Will the gentleman yield for just one more question?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes, indeed.

Mr. CELLER. I was also interested in the gentleman's statement when he stated that if there was a continuous chase over the 3-mile limit that the revenue cutter had the right to its prize, if it captured any foreign ship carrying liquor or other contraband.

Mr. MADDEN. That is what I understand.

Mr. CELLER. Is it not true that such a case was determined in the United States circuit court of appeals——

Mr. MADDEN. I am not a lawyer and I do not know. I am just stating what I have been informed.

Mr. CELLER. If I may be so bold as to correct the gentleman, I think the statement is in error, because I do not think you have the right to go across the 3-mile limit, despite the fact that the unlawful act may have been committed within the 3-mile limit. I think it has been so held and the prize taken under such circumstances released.

Mr. MADDEN. If the ship undertook to get away within the 3-mile limit, and I was the officer in charge, I would take a chance in going after it.

Mr. CELLER. There has been a case of that kind involving English ships, and they have been released.

Mr. MADDEN. I do not want to get into any argument of that kind, because the gentleman is too technical for me.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The gentleman will recall that Admiral Billard, when he was before the committee, said that in a continuous pursuit they could go beyond the 3-mile limit.

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. SNYDER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. SNYDER. I just want to say that I am in the same position that the gentleman from Illinois is in by having voted against the eighteenth amendment, but I stand for the enforcement of the law, and I believe in this proposition. I think the great disgrace in this country to-day is this bootlegging proposition from the coast line in, and if this will stop it I am for it.

Mr. MADDEN. We are going to enforce it.

Mr. SNYDER. I am for it if it takes $13,000,000 or $36,000,000.

Mr. MADDEN. We are going to enforce it; that is what we are going to do, and there is going to be no question about it. There is no use in anybody saying it can not be done, because it can be done and is going to be done. [Applause.]

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, it is not my purpose to detain the committee more than a very few minutes in the discussion of this bill. There are quite a number of gentlemen who are desirous of addressing the House under general debate, and it is my desire and purpose to yield them most of the time at my disposal.

Before referring to the bill I want to call the attention of the House to a telegram which I received this morning, and which is supplemental to some telegrams I presented to the House during the discussion of the Ford offer for Muscle Shoals. Gentlemen of the House will remember that I stated that the Nashville Banner, one of the leading daily newspapers in the South, published at my home, in Nashville, Tenn., was conducting a referendum among the citizens to ascertain just what their desires were with reference to the disposition of Muscle Shoals, a referendum of the citizens in Nashville and also in surrounding middle Tennessee towns which are just north of the shoals in question.

I received a telegram from Maj. E. B. Stahlman, owner and publisher of the Nashville Banner, in which he gives the final result of that referendum, and I wish to read it to the House, with your permission:

NASHVILLE, TENN., March 12, 1924.

Hon. JOSEPH W. BYRNS, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.:

Count of total and final vote in Banner's referendum on shoals proposition gives Ford, 56,145. Associated power companies, 49. Government ownership, 16. Equal to 864 to 1 for Ford. Approximately 20,000 came from Nashville and Davidson County. Thirty thousand from other Tennessee counties. Remainder from north Alabama and southwestern Kentucky. There was never a fairer vote cast in Tennessee. Every ballot had printed on it for or against proposition, requiring name of voters. Everybody was urged to vote, and the vote as cast was honestly counted. We feel proud of the record made by you and other Members of the Tennessee delegation on this question.

E. B. STAHLMAN.

[Applause.]

This vote, in my judgment, very correctly represents the sentiment of practically the entire South with reference to the Ford offer.

Mr. SCHNEIDER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I yield.

Mr. SCHNEIDER. Was that vote promoted by the public press? Was it a newspaper that promoted this referendum vote on Muscle Shoals?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The referendum was taken by a newspaper; but there were committees appointed by the chamber of commerce, three representing the Ford offer and three representing the power companies, and these committees outlined the reasons governing them in their idea as to what should be done with Muscle Shoals, and these statements were published in this paper at the beginning of the referendum; and the vote, which was submitted in the way of coupons printed in the paper, afforded an opportunity to those who cast their votes to write their names and also to vote either for the Ford offer or for the associated power companies or for Government ownership.

Mr. SCHNEIDER. The only question I have in mind, I might say, is whether this was conducted the same as was the referendum on the Mellon tax bill by the Literary Digest.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I do not know just how the Literary Digest conducted that referendum.

Mr. SCHNEIDER. I guess nobody else does.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I do not suppose anybody else does; but I have read this telegram simply to indicate to the House just how the South, and particularly that portion of the Southland near Muscle Shoals, regarded this proposition. They are on the ground, and they believe they know just what is to the best interest of the South and the country.

They believe that Henry Ford will develop Muscle Shoals for the good of the entire country, and they believe that he will carry out his promises and pledges to the letter. To show that this sentiment is not confined to any particular class of citizens, I noticed an interview commenting upon the action of the House in accepting the Ford offer with Mr. James E. Caldwell, of Nashville, Tenn., president of one of the largest banks in the South and one of the most prominent and wealthiest financiers of the South. In that interview he commended the House and stated that he would rather see Henry Ford have that proposition on his own terms than that Congress should have denied him an opportunity to develop the shoals, because he believed that development by Henry Ford means prosperity for the South and for the whole country.

Mr. Chairman, I am not going to discuss the pending bill. It has been very fully discussed and explained by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], the chairman of the committee, with his usual force and clearness. There is nothing that I could add to what he has said. There are no controversies relative to the bill that I know anything about. It comes with the unanimous report of the committee and it was agreed upon without any particular difference of opinion. As he explained, the bill carries $153,583,980.08. The estimates were $154,084,005.81. In other words, the bill carries $387,438.75 less than the estimates. Of the amount carried in the bill $116,608,367.54 is recommended to meet expenditures necessary for the year 1923 and preceding years. Something over $105,000,000 of that amount is required for the refund of taxes. By way of supplemental appropriations for the current fiscal year there is recommended $37,088,199.52, and, of course, that should be added to the appropriations for 1924.

There is carried in this bill, and I want to refer to it just briefly, a recommendation of an appropriation of $1,110,000 for the Alaskan Railroad. Those who were in the House at the time the legislation was passed authorizing the construction of that road and its operation by the Government will recall that it was said at that time that it would not cost to exceed $35,000,000 to build the road. Those who opposed it at the time, and I was one of them, insisted that it might cost $75,000,000. As a matter of fact, it cost $56,000,000. There is asked now an appropriation of $5,250,000 to be expended over a period of a few years for replacements and betterments to take care of certain temporary structures, and which it is evident to my mind from the hearings will have to be granted if the road is to be kept in a safe and serviceable condition. That will carry the cost of the road to $61,250,000. It is my judgment that after a few years, or after that money has been expended, there doubtless will have to be additional money appropriated, because despite what is said, while I have never visited Alaska, yet from description given as to conditions there, the fact of repeated freezes and thaws, I am satisfied that the Government will have to be continually expending money to keep that road up, to take care of its roadbed, bridges, and so forth. The facts are that the operating deficit of that road to-day is $1,000,000 a year. We are carrying in this bill $245,000 to supplement an appropriation of $1,000,000, which was made for the anticipated deficit for the current year, and it is said that the operating deficit next year will be $1,000,000. That does not take into consideration the loss by depreciation or interest upon the money invested. If those things are considered, it is costing the Government, in addition to operating deficit, something like $6,000,000 a year. In other words, the Alaskan Railroad is costing the Government to-day, when you take into consideration the question of depreciation, of interest on capital, of the question of amortization, at least $7,000,000 and possibly more. This is an expensive proposition, but we have the property there, and as it is rendering service it will have to be continued.

Mr. SHERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. SHERWOOD. Is there any indication anywhere that it ever paid a cent?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. No; on the contrary, I think the indications are it will always be a charge upon the Government. It was said by Mr. Landis, the new manager appointed several months ago by the present administration, that he hoped by the end of next year to make the receipts equal the expenditures, but he was not altogether clear in his statement as to just how it was anticipated that that would be done, especially since he admitted that it would require a million dollars next year to take care of the operating deficit. Of course, he can only provide for that by increased freight.

Mr. SHERWOOD. At the time that bill passed I had the honor to vote against it.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. So did I.

Mr. SHERWOOD. It was predicted then that there were immense coal fields there. Has any coal ever been gotten out?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I think they are getting out some coal, but not to the extent anticipated at that time.

Mr. SHERWOOD. It would be to the advantage of the Government if the whole thing were scrapped now, would it not?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. So far as a monetary proposition is concerned it would, but inasmuch as the Government has made an investment of $50,000,000 and more, and as it is rendering some service, I suppose, to Alaska in its development, I do not now think it should be scrapped.

Mr. SHERWOOD. There are only about 50,000 people in the whole Territory.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. That is correct.

Mr. RAKER. It has only been about a year and a little over since the bridge that made the railroad usable from one end to the other was completed.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. That is correct.

Mr. RAKER. So that up until, say, within a year the road has not been in shape to use for its entire length?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I think that is true.

Mr. RAKER. So we ought not to criticize it at all until it gets in full operation—and I am not saying that the gentleman is criticizing it.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I am trying to state the facts as they appear to me.

Mr. RAKER. We reserved a tract of land for naval coal. We started in to develop it, and about a year ago we stopped it without any cause or excuse. Instead of our proceeding to develop and do as we should have done, we have stopped work on something that would give this road something upon which to exist.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. And I think that is the only way by which the railroad can be made to pay anything like expenses. Of course, as the gentleman knows, the arguments which were made at the time the bill was passed were that the railroad was necessary in order to develop this coal for naval purposes and also, of course, to help agriculture to a limited extent and in the development of the territory generally.

Mr. RAKER. But we ought not to begin to think about scrapping this wonderful piece of property until the Government has fairly and legitimately determined in regard to it.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I agree with the gentleman. I think this investment is too large to consider scrapping it, and it is rather an expensive proposition, since it costs the Government over a million dollars a year to carry it along without regard to depreciation and interest on invested capital.

Mr. RAKER. I was just thinking, hearing the testimony this morning, where we gave 44,000,000 acres of land to build a railroad and lost about $270,000,000 by virtue of it, we ought not hastily to turn it down where we are trying to-day to save this asset for the Government.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. No; I think we should conserve it as best we can.

Mr. SCHNEIDER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Very briefly.

Mr. SCHNEIDER. Does the gentleman know anything about the efficiency of the operation of the Alaskan Railroad?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Well, I have no reason to criticize the manner of its operation. Of course, my information is obtained altogether from the hearings upon this bill, and that information has come from those who are in charge of its operation.

Mr. SCHNEIDER. The gentleman has heard complaints about inefficiency?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I have heard some, and I understand that a new manager has been recently appointed, and he professes to be able to pull it out of the hole to some extent.

Mr. SCHNEIDER. And the discrimination against the railroad and the interests up there to make it a failure?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I do not doubt but what it exists. I think the Government should take steps now to develop that coal for naval purposes. We were told when the bill was passed that the coal was well adapted for naval purposes. An analysis of the coal was presented here and I presume it was correct. I have never understood why the Government should have abandoned the development of that coal for its own use, because that is the only way that the Government can in a measure recoup for the expenditure that has been made on the railroad. I think everything ought to be done to make it a paying proposition.

Mr. SCHNEIDER. The gentleman knows that the natural resources of Alaska are being given to private interests?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Well, I hope they are not being given away now. I have an idea that a great deal of it has been given away, as was the case with a good many of the natural resources of our own continental territory.

Mr. SCHNEIDER. Muscle Shoals.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, that statement ought not to go unchallenged, and I want to call attention to it and say that there is practically none of this land in Alaska and its resources turned over to private individuals. Legislation was passed some eight years ago retaining this property, and this railroad was authorized to be built for the purpose of developing it, and within the last year and a half instead of the Government developing its coal for naval purposes they have closed down.

Mr. SNYDER. Now what would be the real reason for developing that coal if the Navy is to discontinue the use of coal?

Mr. RAKER. I would like to have the facts of why they stopped the development of the coal and the natural resources in Alaska?

Mr. SNYDER. It may be they stopped because they are not going to use coal in the Navy.

Mr. RAKER. Not at all; we did not stop for that reason.

Mr. SHERWOOD. I understood there were two tests of Alaska coal made by the Navy Department, and they made a report as to its suitability for the Navy for battleships and reported it was not suitable on account of the presence of so much sulphur in the coal, and therefore that it was not desirable coal.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I have seen such statement as that.

Mr. SHERWOOD. There have been two tests made by the Navy Department.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I want to refer briefly—and then close—to something already discussed by the gentleman from Illinois, and that is the appropriation of $13,850,622 for the Coast Guard for the purpose of helping to enforce the prohibition law. Nobody can read the statement of Admiral Billard or Commander Root before this committee without being startled and shocked at the manner in which the prohibition laws of this country have been flouted by rum runners. He made a startling revelation when he described the sources of liquors on islands near our country and the number of vessels and the manner in which they brought liquor into this country. He told the committee that if he were given the opportunity of building and manning 323 fast motor boats and was given the use of 20 torpedo boat destroyers and two mine sweepers he would be able in large measure to keep whisky out of this country; that is, to prevent its importation from the high seas.

I do not know of any other way that can be done. He told of ship after ship in which thousands of cases of liquors were brought into this country in the last few months. Whether one agrees with the prohibition laws or not, whether he is a prohibitionist or not, he should believe in the enforcement of our laws, and he must feel that it is the duty of the Congress to appropriate every dollar that is necessary to see that those laws are strictly enforced, because if our laws are not enforced, if the Government does not stand for a strict enforcement of all its laws, we all know it can not retain the respect of the citizens of this country or of the world in general. I am heartily in favor of that appropriation, and I believe from the statement made by Admiral Billard that if given what he desires he will be able to keep out of this country the liquors which are now coming in from the high seas. This puts it up to the prohibition unit, which is also given large sums of money for enforcing the law, to see that it does not come across our borders and to see that it is not manufactured and sold within our borders.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. LINTHICUM. How much do you think it will take for this appropriation and the other sums appropriated for the enforcement of the Volstead Act?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. We are appropriating something like $10,000,000, I think, or a little more, for the enforcement of the prohibition act in the Treasury bill.

Mr. SNYDER. Within our borders?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes; within our borders. This carries an appropriation of $10,084,900 for the acquisition of 323 motor boats and their equipment; $2,110,000 for reconditioning and equipping destroyers and mine sweepers; and then $1,065,722 for the pay of the additional personnel necessary to man these boats. My recollection is Admiral Billard stated this would be to an extent temporary. It would not be necessary for any great length of time to maintain such a large force, and possibly it would cost $10,000,000 a year.

Mr. LINTHICUM. It would cost altogether about $25,000,000 a year.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. About $20,000,000.

Mr. LINTHICUM. For five years at $25,000,000 a year would be $125,000,000.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The gentleman knows also that the Coast Guard is instrumental in saving vessels and lives on the high seas. This will be in addition to the other duties.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Is not the gentleman afraid they will not have time to perform other duties?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I believe from the statement of Admiral Billard that he will be able to cope with this evil that is besetting the country.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Do you suppose the United States courts would have time to attend to all the cases? The number of cases coming before the courts have largely increased since the Volstead Act was passed.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. If we can keep out of this country a million or two cases of whisky every year, there will be a less number of criminal cases before the courts.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I think if you kept that many out of the country there would be just that many manufactured in the country.

Mr. SNYDER. When did the admiral lead you to believe that we would get to the peak of this force ready to operate?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I could tell the gentleman if I were to quote from the hearings, but my impression is that he stated this fall. I am not certain of that.

Mr. SNYDER. I was wondering whether that was not one of the reasons why it would take five years to clean up the job, because I can not conceive how a man with 235 ships would take five years to sweep the coast clean. He should be able to do it in five months.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. He expects to stop the business. But the gentleman knows that other devices may be adopted, and it may take some time to educate these rum runners into the knowledge that they can not continue to violate the law with impunity, and probably this appropriation would have to be kept up for a series of years, and I take it a certain police force will always have to be maintained.

Mr. SNYDER. I do not question that.

Mr. LINTHICUM. What will you do after the five years?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. We hope it will be eliminated by that time.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, the committee wants to run until 6 o'clock. I yield 45 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. TINKHAM, and there will be another speaker after him, the gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. GALLIVAN, who will probably consume the remainder of the time.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. LEHLBACH). The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TINKHAM] is recognized for 45 minutes.

Mr. TINKHAM. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. TINKHAM. Mr. Chairman, I desire to read certain correspondence between the Rev. Charles S. McFarland, general secretary of the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America, and myself, and make certain remarks thereon.

On the 10th of February I received the following letter:

FEDERAL COUNCIL OF THE CHURCHES OF CHRIST IN AMERICA (INC.),
OFFICE OF THE GENERAL SECRETARY,
New York, February 9, 1924.

Hon. GEORGE H. TINKHAM,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. TINKHAM: I have the honor to convey for your information the following resolution passed by the administrative committee of the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America regarding the pending House immigration bill (H. R. 6540), so far as it proposes to abrogate the treaty with Japan and to annul the "gentlemen's agreement" without conference or consultation with the Government of Japan.

The administrative committee regards the proposed action as a flagrant violation of accepted principles of courteous and friendly international relations and earnestly requests that the bill not be passed.

The resolution reads as follows:

"Resolved, That the administrative committee of the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America, in harmony with the principles repeatedly advocated by the federal council and its executive committee, deplores the proposal of the immigration bill (H. R. 6540) to deny admission to the United States of "aliens ineligible for citizenship":

"First, because it abrogates treaties and annuls international agreements by an act of Congress without consultation or conference with the nations with which the treaties and agreements were made; and

"Second, because it is unnecessarily and inevitably offensive to the nations affected thereby, and certain to be resented as an unfriendly act.

"Resolved, That these resolutions be sent to each Member of Congress with a suitable covering letter."

Respectfully yours,

CHARLES S. MACFARLAND,
General Secretary.

FEBRUARY 13, 1924.

CHARLES S. MACFARLAND,
Secretary Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America,
105 East Twenty-second Street, New York, N. Y.

MY DEAR SIR: It is with resentment and indignation that I read your communication of February 9, in which you, representing your organization, presume to advise me in relation to a purely secular matter, namely, the House immigration bill (H. R. 6540).

It is one of the fundamental principles of the American Government, preceding the adoption of the Constitution and embodied in that instrument, that there shall be in the United States complete separation of the church and the state as religious and political entities, and that there shall be no interference one with the other.

The action of certain churches of certain denominations, or, I might more properly say, of certain leaders of certain denominations, in passing resolutions in relation to legislation of a secular character and of raising funds to be used for political elections, as was done in connection with the Anti-Saloon League of America, is indefensible.

It is my settled opinion that some of the great lawlessness and actual crime in this country to-day is directly caused by the loss of respect for the church and its teachings on the part of the people because churches, abandoning spiritual affairs and direction, have become quasi political institutions. As respect for the church and its teachings declines, so must its authority over the hearts and consciences of men diminish.

I have not a drop of blood in my veins which has not been 200 years in America, and my ancestors, as Separatists, came to this country upon the Mayflower. I inherit their complete resentment of interference by the state with the church or by the church with the state.

Inclosed is copy of a resolution recently introduced by me in the House of Representatives, which, together with this letter, I should be pleased to have you read to the administrative committee of the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America. All the allegations contained therein are supported by documentary or sworn evidence.

Very truly yours, GEORGE HOLDEN TINKHAM.

[Inclosure.]

House Resolution 82.

Whereas one of the fundamental principles of the American Government preceding the adoption of the Constitution and embodied in that instrument is that there shall be in the United States of America complete separation of the church and the state as religious and political entities, and that there shall be no interference one with the other; and

Whereas certain leaders of sectarian bodies, perverting the great powers of religion during recent years, have actively engaged in partisan elections and in the presentation of legislative programs to the Congress and to other legislative bodies, which are constituted to represent all of the people of the United States in all of their activities; and

Whereas the leaders of such sectarian bodies, in conjunction with large aggregations of business capital and encouraged financially by several men of great individual wealth, have constituted as their political agent an organization known as the Anti-Saloon League of America, with departments or subsidiaries in every State in the Union; and

Whereas the name adopted by this league was and is fraudulent and misleading as to its intentions and purposes, which were to establish complete prohibition and not alone to abolish saloons; and

Whereas for a number of years the Anti-Saloon League of America and its respective State departments and subsidiaries have raised and expended vast sums of money, the amounts, sources, and expenditure of which have no public accounting; and

Whereas such vast sums of money have been used to influence public opinion in various ways, now entirely unsuspected by the American people, directly to control elections and to pay professional organizers and lobbyists throughout the United States, particularly in Washington, D. C.; and

Whereas for many years the Anti-Saloon League of America, its respective State departments or subsidiaries, have openly and flagrantly violated the national campaign contributions law and the corrupt practices laws of the several and certain of the States; and

Whereas the Anti-Saloon League of America paid campaign expenses of Hon. Andrew J. Volstead while chairman of the Judiciary Committee, having foreknowledge that the representatives of said league would appear before him for legislation, and subsequently did appear before him and obtained the legislation it desired; and

Whereas through practices hereinbefore set forth said Anti-Saloon League of America has successfully added to the Constitution of the United States the eighteenth amendment, and has caused to be enacted into law the national prohibition act, otherwise known as the Volstead law, by the Congress of the United States, and of so-called enforcement acts by the legislatures of several and certain of the States of the Union; has attempted to influence Federal judicial appointments; has denounced judicial officers and decisions; has attempted to influence the President of the United States in his appointments of heads of departments, and actually exercised its insidious influence successfully upon a bureau of an executive department (a bureau whose unparalleled corruption and lawlessness is without example) to the extent that even appointments of persons in the service of such bureau are made with the sanction and approval of the Anti-Saloon League of America: Therefore

Resolved, That a select committee is hereby created, to consist of seven members to be appointed by the Speaker of the House of Representatives, to investigate the activities of the Anti-Saloon League of America and its respective State departments or subsidiaries as hereinbefore alleged in particular and in general; and said committee is authorized to send for persons and papers, to compel the attendance of and to administer oaths to witnesses, to conduct such inquiries at such times and places as the committee may deem necessary, and to report its findings and recommendations to the House of Representatives, either separately or together, with such report as said committee may submit in connection with any proposed legislation.

THE FEDERAL COUNCIL OF THE CHURCHES OF CHRIST IN AMERICA,
OFFICE OF THE GENERAL SECRETARY,
New York, February 25, 1924.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN TINKHAM: In reply to your letter of February 13, first of all may I explain that your references to the Anti-Saloon League have no bearing on any issue in which the Federal Council is concerned, as there is no relationship of any kind whatever between the Federal Council and that body. Therefore there is no reason for bringing your resolution before the administrative committee of the Federal Council, except perhaps for information.

Is not the real question as to the content of the term "secular"? The Federal Council does not consider any question involving principles of right and justice as being secular. Such questions are regarded as moral, and therefore inherently religious and coming under Christian ethics. The measure in question surely involves questions of right and justice.

The Federal Council was constituted by its denominational bodies with this purpose, as stated in the constitution adopted by all those bodies separately, "to secure a larger combined influence for the Churches of Christ in all matters affecting the moral and social condition of the people, so as to promote the application of the law of Christ in every relation of human life." To claim that a church body has no right to protest against an injustice just because it is legislative would be to nullify the constitution of the Federal Council. It is the very separation of church and state that makes it possible to make such protest freely. Suppose that the Federal Council were to perpetrate a public wrong. I should say that Congress would have the right to protest against it if not to prohibit it. Indeed, you yourself are claiming just that right in the bill you introduced on the Anti-Saloon League.

My own recollections of the history of those who came in the Mayflower and those who followed them are that they exercised a great deal of influence on matters of state, while at the same time keeping the church free from interference by the state. Indeed, their reason for separating the two was that the church might be free to criticise the actions of the state.

I think the general feeling is that on the one hand there should be organic separation between church and state, neither controlling the other, but that, nevertheless, this does not preclude moral relations between them.

If I remember rightly, the state, during the war and at other times, has sought counsel and support from the churches. Various departments of the Government often call on the Federal Council for counsel and help. This is quite a common occurrence at our Washington office.

Is there not a great difference between organic separation and separation in moral sympathy? As a matter of fact the strictest denominations have always held the right of the church to petition the state, and that is exactly what is done in this case.

In this case our feeling is that this legislation runs counter to the efforts of the churches to maintain social justice. Do you not think, therefore, that they have not only a right but a duty to protest and petition? I rather think the administrative committee regarded the immigration proposal "with resentment and indignation," just as you do their action. The committee which took the unanimous action is composed of the official representatives of 29 denominations, and some of them also date their ancestry back to the Mayflower, as well as yourself.

We evidently have an honest difference of opinion here between men entitled to each other's respect, and I suspect many of these men are just as positive as yourself. Doubtless both you and they are conscientiously trying to perform duty. In this case they certainly represent a very great body of public opinion, and several Congressmen have written expressing their appreciation of the interest of the churches. Some Congressmen are actually desirous of getting such expressions of public opinion. As I get the trend of public opinion it means that Christianity is to be applied more and more to these great public moral questions rather than to remain in vague abstractions. Many of the people feel that the weakness of the church has been because it did not exert its influence more directly in affairs of social brotherhood. What is the use of proclaiming justice unless you can apply it to concrete cases? Personally, I would quit the ministry if confined to mere abstractions and prohibited from applying them to public interests.

The people in the churches are rapidly coming to look at all public affairs as matters of Christian ethics. The present problem of immigration, so far as it affects our attitude toward other peoples, is no exception. The leaders of the church are tired of preaching justice in theory and closing their eyes to injustice in practice. If an act of Congress violates a treaty, whether in letter or spirit, it is an injustice. If it treats a treaty or any agreement like a "scrap of paper" it follows the bad example of a nation now suffering for doing so. If, then, this was the view of the administrative committee, would you want them to hesitate to say so? Even if you disagree with their interpretation you surely would want them to express their judgment from the point of view of the Christian principles to which they are committed. Probably they would insist on having as much right as yourself to determine whether or not the question is ethical, and in any event surely Christian ethics are not left entirely to be determined by Congress.

Sincerely yours, CHARLES S. MACFARLAND.

P. S.—I earnestly trust you will not object to my making this correspondence public, including your name, because it is very important that both points of view should be presented. If you prefer not to use your name I shall probably wish to release it without mentioning your identity.

C. S. M.

Hon. GEORGE HOLDEN TINKHAM,
Committee on Appropriations,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

FEBRUARY 29, 1924.

Rev. CHARLES S. MACFARLAND,
Secretary Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America,
105 East Twenty-second Street, New York, N. Y.

MY DEAR MR. MACFARLAND: Your communication of February 25 in answer to my communication of February 13, which was sent to you in reply to one which you sent me under date of February 9, has been received. I am pleased to be informed that "there is no relationship of any kind whatever between the Federal council" and the Anti-Saloon League.

If I read aright your letter of the 25th, it is a statement that the churches included in your organization propose to take a formal and active part in American politics.

Let me point out that this is a pretty dangerous program for the churches. Of course, their ministers and members are, as individual citizens, at liberty and, indeed, ought to be encouraged to act politically with the utmost vigor, but for churches as organizations to attempt this is a grave departure from American policy and a violation of American traditions.

We exempt the property of churches from taxation because they are regarded as apart from the ordinary public organizations and activities of our people and as entitled to this measure of public support because of the purposes which they aim to serve.

The argument of your letter is expressed at so great length and so vaguely that I may be misinterpreting it, but I think not. In any event, I beg you to consider carefully before committing the organized churches of the country to participating in political activities.

You request me to allow publication of my communication of February 13. I appreciate the courtesy on your part of making the request. You have my permission to publish my communication of February 13, provided there is published at the same time this communication, both with my name. As I know you will have no objection, it is my intention at the first opportunity to insert our correspondence in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Sincerely yours,

GEORGE HOLDEN TINKHAM.

This correspondence was written in ordinary course of office routine and was not originally intended for publication.

Upon reviewing this correspondence I note that in my communication of February 29 to Rev. Charles S. Macfarland I said:

The argument of your letter is expressed at so great length and so vaguely that I may be misinterpreting it, but I think not.

In this sentence I did not intend to be ungracious or to suggest that the subject was not of such importance as to warrant treating it at great length. I appreciate the sincerity of Mr. Macfarland in the position he takes and from which I dissent.

In addition to what the correspondence contains, I should like to state that I know of no political question or issue which could not be denominated either a moral or ethical question or issue or one involving right or justice if it served the will or purpose of any organization so to term it.

There are no limits to the definition of moral, ethical, right, or justice in reference to any political question or issue. The free-silver issue was called a moral question. The tariff has been spoken of as such an issue. The socialist claims that his principles are moral principles and involve right and justice. Whether one person should possess more property than another might be a moral or political question or an issue of right or justice if one wished to make the claim.

If an organization asserts its intention to interest itself in every legislative and political question which it considers moral or ethical or involves right or justice, there is no limit to its participation in any legislative or political matter in which it desires to exert its influence.

Finally I wish to add that until recent years the traditions and philosophy of the Pilgrims who came to Plymouth upon the Mayflower in 1620 have directed American action and have been embodied in American policies.

The Pilgrims were not Puritans. They were separatists, and believed in the complete separation of the church and the state as religious and political entities and that there should be no interference one with the other.

The Puritans were nonconformists and dissenters who saw no objection in the state controlling the church or the church the state, but desired the purification of the church, its ritual and practices, and a reform of state authority.

With the advent of Cromwell the Puritans in England controlled the state and consequently the church. Large numbers settled in New England and were fiercely intolerant, cruelly dogmatic, and devotees of fanatical sumptuary law. At one time their political power was so great that they prescribed that no one should have political franchise unless he was a member of one of certain church denominations. But this intolerance and fanaticism of the Puritans was gradually superseded by the tolerant philosophy of the milder Pilgrims, which tolerant and milder philosophy previous to the adoption of our Constitution and until recent days has dominated this great Republic.

A perilous course is being adopted in this Republic if churches, as organizations, are to enter American political activities and if reliance is to be placed upon sumptuary law instead of upon moral suasion and education. [Applause.]

How much time have I consumed, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. Twenty-three minutes. The gentleman has 22 minutes remaining.

APPALLING AND UNBELIEVABLE INCREASE IN ARRESTS FOR CRIME IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. TINKHAM. Mr. Chairman, under the leave granted to me to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I beg to submit the following:

Statistics of arrests in the District of Columbia, as reported officially by the superintendent and major of police to the Subcommittee on the District of Columbia of the Appropriations Committee, disclose a civic depravity and social disintegration under present conditions and laws which are both appalling and unbelievable. Were they not exact calculations formally submitted to the House of Representatives by the Metropolitan police department, the figures could not be accepted as true.

These statistics reveal that although, according to the census, there was an increase in population from 1910 to 1920 of only 22.17 per cent, and there has been only a very slight further increase to 1923, the following percentages of increase in arrests for crime between the year 1910 and the year 1923 have taken place:

	Per cent.
Murder	271
Manslaughter	250
Assault with dangerous weapons	307
Assault with intent to kill	28
Robbery	103
Bigamy	83
False pretense	83
Forgery	760
Grand larceny	157
Housebreaking	85
Rape and intent to rape	71
Threats of personal violence	118
Carrying weapons	84
Adultery	201
Fornication	135
Disorderly house	1,388
Soliciting prostitution	2,350
Maintaining of nuisance	256

Where crimes, such as liquor crimes, were not in existence in 1910 the official percentages of increase in arrests, as calculated by the Metropolitan police department, is based upon a comparison with the year in which the law went into effect, and are as follows:

	Per cent.
Illegal possession	700
Manufacture of liquor	223
Selling	1,079
Transporting	4,504
Possession of property designed for the manufacture of liquor	233
Violation of other laws governing the manufacture and sale of malted liquor	6
Drunkenness	121
Drinking in public places	84
Operating a vehicle while under the influence of liquor	850

From 1910 to 1923 the following arrests for drunkenness have been made in the District of Columbia:

1910	3,783
1911	4,888
1912	5,663
1913	5,710
1914	8,889
1915	9,788
1916	9,449
1917	8,687
1918	6,896
1919	6,651
1920	3,568
1921	5,415
1922	6,375
1923	8,368

Operating a vehicle while under the influence of liquor was not made a crime until 1918. From 1918 to 1923 the following arrests for this crime have been made:

1918	53
1919	143
1920	89
1921	166
1922	296
1923	504

From 1910 to 1923 the following percentages of decrease in arrests for crime have taken place:

	Per cent.
Embezzlement	29
Simple assault	12
Disorderly conduct	35
Petit larceny	30
Indecent exposure	62
Nonsupport of wife and children	89
Incorrigibility	56
Indigent or dependent children	46

But little encouragement can be taken from a decrease of 29 per cent in embezzlement and 30 per cent in petit larceny when there are very much larger percentages of increases in robbery, housebreaking, grand larceny, forgery, and false pretense; or from a decrease of 12 per cent in simple assault with much larger percentages of increase in murder, manslaughter, assault with dangerous weapon, and assault with intent to kill.

The decrease of 35 per cent in disorderly conduct between 1910 and 1923 is nearly entirely accounted for by the fact that previous to 1913 cases of drunkenness were often charged to disorderly conduct.

The decrease in arrests for nonsupport of wife and children, for incorrigibility, and on account of indigent or dependent children between 1910 and 1923 is all accounted for by a court decision in 1913 which held that the police department was without authority in these cases.

The District of Columbia is 2,000 per cent more murderous than the city of London. According to the latest statistics, which are for 1922, during that year there occurred in London, with its population of 8,000,000, 28 murders, and there occurred in the District of Columbia, with its population of less than 500,000, 38 murders.

The District of Columbia is 300 per cent more drunken than the city of Paris. According to statistics, in 1923 there were in Paris, with its population of 3,000,000, only 16,000 arrests for drunkenness, and there were in the District of Columbia, with its population of less than 500,000, over 8,000 arrests for drunkenness.

Many causes may be assigned for these amazing and portentous phenomena of American social decline.

Among the foremost should be placed the abdication of certain sects of the Christian church from their spiritual direction and leadership and their assumption of political and legislative domination. This is particularly evidenced in the District of Columbia by the erection of expensive buildings around the Capitol for the avowed purpose of influencing legislative action, and by the maintenance of professional legislative agents. As respect for the church and its teachings decline so must its authority over the hearts and consciences of men diminish.

Another potent reason is a loss of confidence in and respect for present Congresses and, therefore, for laws passed by them—Congresses which ruthlessly destroy the rights of the individual and the rights of property, Congresses which themselves even will not obey the mandatory constitutional obligations placed upon them, and so feeble in intellect as to believe that virtue can be produced by law and statute and so cowardly as to surrender their power to legislate to every organized minority with money and power.

But civic depravity and social disintegration have their beginning in the home. One of the highest ideals and greatest sources of strength to American civilization until recent years was the character and permanency of American family life. In the home was built the character of the individual, there were taught the value of self-restraint and the virtues of honesty, truthfulness, and obedience to authority. To-day the American home is in decadence. Between the year 1910 and the year 1923 divorce in the United States and in the District of Columbia has increased over 100 per cent.

Total arrests each year with arrests for violation of speed and traffic regulations indicated so that the table shows the net number of arrests less traffic violations.

[1] The only cases of nonsupport of wife and children handled by the police are when indictments have been brought and the dependents are out of this jurisdiction. The court of appeals held on Nov. 1, 1915, that the police department was without authority in cases of this character, and warrants issued on this charge should be served by the United States marshal. In cases reported to the police department effort is made to locate the defendants and if successful the information is furnished to the office of the marshal.

Under a similar ruling, in cases of incorrigibility or indigent or dependant children the only cases coming to the attention of the police are where parents or guardians bring the children to a police station where they are temporarily cared for at the house of detention until the juvenile court can take jurisdiction.

Prior to 1913 violations of the traffic regulations were included with violations of the police regulations.

Soliciting prostitution, prior to 1913, was charged under the head of vagrancy.

Until the passage of the national prohibition law, the possession of liquor, or possession of property designed for the manufacture thereof, were not violations of law "selling" prior to the passage of the local prohibition law included the selling without a license; the "violation of other laws governing the manufacture and sale of malted liquor" prior to the passage of this act included selling on Sunday, selling after hours, selling to minors, and to intoxicated persons. Prior to the passage of the Sheppard Act, drinking in public places was governed by what was known as the Jones-Works law, approved Mar. 4, 1913.

[2] Includes bringing liquor into military zone and violation of the "Reed bone dry law."

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GALLIVAN] 30 minutes.

Mr. GALLIVAN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have the opportunity to talk to a quorum.

Mr. MADDEN. We are good listeners.

Mr. GALLIVAN. In what I say I shall not be talking to the newspapers. I want to talk to the House. I would like to have Members of the House listen to what I say. That is without any criticism of my colleague [Mr. TINKHAM].

Mr. HERSEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GALLIVAN. If you are going to ask some question to help the House and me, I will answer yes. But if the gentleman is going to ask me a question that he thinks will embarrass me, then no.

Mr. HERSEY. I could not embarrass the gentleman.

Mr. GALLIVAN. I do not think you could.

Mr. HERSEY. Does not the gentleman think he has an exclusive and appreciative audience to listen to him?

Mr. GALLIVAN. I have when the gentleman is present. [Laughter.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, I am willing to talk to this handful of representatives of the great American people, and I am astounded to see that there is such a handful of Representatives in the House when every one of the Members is drawing a salary daily and is absent from the House when it has under consideration an important bill.

I got out of a sick bed, against my doctor's advice, to come here this afternoon because I am a member of the subcommittee which reported this bill, and I did not know how long general debate would last, and against his urgent advice I am here.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman is always here when there is any work to do. [Applause.]

Mr. GALLIVAN. I thank my chairman, who is also my leader on my committee. I am always at the committee when there is work to do, even at a sacrifice sometimes of my health.

This morning at 9 o'clock, propped up in bed, I read every word of the interesting if not illuminating discussion of the Coast Guard which was held in this Chamber yesterday, and I want to confess frankly that I learned nothing from it.

I sat with the subcommittee on deficiencies of the House Committee on Appropriations, of which the great chairman from Illinois is also chairman, during all the time we had the Coast Guard officials present, and I think I asked, perhaps, more questions than any other member of the committee excepting our chairman.

I am sorry that the gentleman from Upshawville is not here; that the gentleman from Texas is not in his usual seat; and that the gentleman from Michigan is not up there in the second last row, where he once in a while interrupts us who do not believe in sumptuary legislation.

But I have not come here to oppose the bill. I did not file a minority report, as my colleagues on the subcommittee will say to you; I simply reserved my rights. I may vote for this appropriation; I may, and that is the reason I reserved my rights.

Mr. MADDEN. This is a question of law enforcement, irrespective of whatever anybody's opinion may be on prohibition, is it not?

Mr. GALLIVAN. Absolutely. And the gentleman will recall that when I first addressed Admiral Billard, the commandant of the Coast Guard, I distinctly said—and it is in the record of the hearings—"I am against all rum runners and rum running, but, as a good Democrat, I am against home markets." Somehow or other somewhere in this bill there is a suggestion that the home market will be protected, and that if you drive the rum runner from the seas the land bootlegger will get the best of it. We have a home-market club in my city and it is composed exclusively of Republicans. And I want some of you Democrats not to forget that, and to consider whether the land bootleggers, who are going to vote the Republican ticket in this presidential election, have not reached somebody somewhere to get a provision like this in an appropriation bill, so they will not have any more competition but protection to home industries.

Mr. HILL of Maryland. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GALLIVAN. Certainly.

Mr. HILL of Maryland. The gentleman, as I understand it, suggests that this is for the protection of that flood of moonshine which Commissioner Haynes refers to?

Mr. GALLIVAN. No; I did not desire to suggest it; I simply hinted at it.

Mr. HILL of Maryland. Well, a hint from the gentleman is always an able suggestion, I will say.

Mr. GALLIVAN. Well, the gentleman knows good things when he hears them. [Laughter.]

This deficiency appropriation for the increase of the Coast Guard is something of an innovation. The Coast Guard is older than the Navy, and for more than a century it has protected our coasts against enemies from without and succored our own and other vessels in distress. There are no better traditions associated with our Government than hover about the Coast Guard, and you gentlemen from the interior may find romance and heroism and tragedy recorded if you will come to the New England coast for your summer vacation and travel up and down the coast, see the wrecks of ships that have gone ashore in the storms and hear the stories of rescue of men and women by the Coast Guard that patrols that coast day and night, the good Samaritans of Uncle Sam who are ever ready to sacrifice their own comfort and life itself to rescue those who are in peril.

I have lived with the Coast Guard all my life, and no one can have a higher appreciation of its benefit to the Government and to humanity than I. I have on this floor fought for better consideration of this service, for larger appropriations, for improved facilities to extend its usefulness and to increase the pay of the men who give their lives to its humanitarian efforts. But Congress has been conservative in its appropriations for the Coast Guard, and last year we appropriated a total of about $11,000,000 for this great service. Here we propose to give an additional appropriation of $14,000,000 to the Coast Guard, for what? To enable it to assist the prohibition unit to enforce the Volstead law, with the explanation that the prohibition unit has broken down and is unable to check the inflow of foreign liquors into this bone-dry country.

It is true that the Coast Guard has from the beginning operated against smugglers, but the officers told the committee that so effective had been this part of the service that long ago smuggling became a very insignificant feature of violations of our laws.

The Coast Guard has been able to devote its time and effort to the rescue of shipping, the preservation of life, and the protection of the sea lanes through which the commerce of the world passes in keeping safe the means of travel and transportation between America and the rest of the world.

But Admiral Billard explained to the committee that "higher-up" authority had directed the Coast Guard to submit estimates for this appropriation with the purpose of equipping the Coast Guard for combating the smuggling of liquor into this country. I have been wondering who the "higher up" is who proposed this change of policy since we passed the Treasury bill a few weeks ago. I do not believe it is Secretary Mellon, who is the head of the Treasury Department and in control of the Coast Guard, and I do not believe that President Coolidge is the "higher up" who has inaugurated this new policy.

I suspect that Admiral Wayne B. Wheeler, of the Anti-Saloon League, has, through Commodore Haynes, of the Prohibition Bureau, injected himself into the situation in an effort to utilize the efficient Coast Guard to restore the prestige of the Volstead law and the enforcement officers. I can imagine Wayne B. Wheeler singing:

O, I am a cook and a captain bold,
And the mate of the Nancy Brig,
And a bo'sen tight and a midship mite,
And the crew of the captain's gig.

Admiral Wheeler might not fit into the Coast Guard, but his ambition and his confidence in himself is illustrated by the lines of Gilbert and Sullivan, "My object all sublime, I shall achieve in time, to let the punishment fit the crime." If Wheeler can have the gallant Coast Guard make prohibition a success, it will redound to the glory of the Anti-Saloon League and Wayne B. Wheeler.

Mr. SHERWOOD. The gentleman has forgotten about Anderson, of New York.

Mr. GALLIVAN. Well, he is not a national officer. It is admitted by the Coast Guard officers that they have been able to make a check of 5 per cent in smuggling of liquor since the inauguration of this new policy, and that, with the expenditure of an additional $14,000,000, they may be able to increase this check to 10 per cent. I would not like to see the Coast Guard make a record of 10 per cent efficiency, even in checking smuggling. That would be a blot on the escutcheon of the Coast Guard. If we are to send this Coast Guard into the service of rum running, I would like to see it equipped for success, not for failure. I for one would prefer to vote an appropriation of fifty or one hundred million dollars for the Coast Guard and success than $14,000,000 and failure, for the appropriation we here propose does not mean control of smuggling.

I recall distinctly asking Admiral Billard, "If we give you all these ships, all this money, and all these men, are you going to stop rum running?" And he said, "I do not know." I said, "Are you coming back every year and ask for a similar appropriation?" He said, "I do not know." And the distinguished chairman of my subcommittee, who is in this audience, said, "Oh, what is the use of evasion; we are establishing a police force on the high seas"—I am not quoting his exact words—

"the Coast Guard as the police force of the sea, and you know we have got to keep it up."

Of course, it does not mean clearing the seas of rum runners, but an annual appropriation to continue the contest with increasing effort to defeat the law and increased appropriations to enable the Coast Guard to combat that effort. If we are in earnest in this new policy of turning the Coast Guard from its duties of safeguarding navigation to stop rum running, I suggest that the gentleman from Michigan offer an amendment to increase the appropriation to $100,000,000; that will enable the Coast Guard to equip itself with the vessels and the men to make effective war on the liquor smugglers, whether they are English, French, or Italian, or of any other nationality; and also be ready for war if international complications develop in the contest. If we are going to suppress liquor smuggling, we will have to ignore treaties and international relations and fight smugglers regardless of the flag under which they sail. The Coast Guard can be relied upon to make that fight if the Congress stands behind it. But let us not send this Coast Guard into a contest without proper equipment or without the backing of the Government in whatever it may do to suppress the smuggling of liquor from foreign territory into the United States in defiance of our sacred Volstead law. Let us go the whole hog in this new departure or not go into it at all. We have appropriated millions of money to enforce the prohibition law, and the condition has been growing worse.

And yet when we ask for a soldiers' bonus we are told that America can not afford so much money every year to give the boys who sacrificed everything from 1917 to November 11, 1918, adjusted compensation; but so far as I can recall the prohibition unit can come in here every week and get any amount of money it wants for the enforcement of prohibition, and there has been nothing like enforcement since we started the first dollar on its way, except the closing of the corner saloon, which all men saw with delight.

While Commissioner Haynes—and I hate to use this word, because it is almost my own name—gallivants about the country telling the people that the Volstead law is enforced and that prohibition is a success, and while Wayne B. Wheeler spreads his publicity to the same effect, we all know that defiance of the law is on the increase. Long lists of arrests and fines and seizures do not testify to law enforcement. They simply emphasize the fact that the law is not enforced; that it is not respected or feared. The Prohibition Commissioner may think that his sole duty is to make arrests, to seize liquors, to search citizens and their property without warrants, and to inaugurate a reign of terror, but that was a method of lawless law enforcement discarded by the men who wrote the Declaration of Independence and adopted the Constitution of the United States, in which the prohibitions were against arbitrary government and not against the people. The shall-nots in the Constitution were against the Government, against the Congress, the Executive, and the courts, and not against the people who pay the expenses of the Government. And those prohibitions are still a part of the Constitution.

President Nicholas Murray Butler, of Columbia University, recently wrote to Commissioner Haynes:

> From the standpoint of the citizen our law is a unit. When I urge obedience to law, I mean obedience to the whole body of American law, Constitution and statutory. I mean the first, the fourth, the fifth, the sixth, the tenth, the fourteenth, and the fifteenth amendments as well as the eighteenth. To select one provision of law for emphatic enforcement at huge cost in derogation of all other provisions of law is itself in spirit a lawless act, and thereby offers incentive to that lawlessness which the genuinely moral and intelligent element of our citizenship are striving by all possible means to check.

I commend this same expression of law enforcement to the prohibition commissioner and to the Members of this body who recite long lists of arrests and tables of fines as evidence of law enforcement.

Why, gentlemen, we are not even protected by that provision of the Constitution which grants us immunity from arrest in going from the sessions of Congress to our homes. Under the reign of terrorism inaugurated here in the National Capital by the commissioner of prohibition a United States Senator was shot down here within the shadow of the Capitol on the one principal thoroughfare designed to connect the legislative and the executive branches of the Government. If there be one street in Washington where a Member of Congress should feel safe to walk, it should be Pennsylvania Avenue; but a few weeks ago Senator GREENE, of Vermont, a man who served long in this House, where we all learned to respect his great ability, his untiring industry, and love his delightful personality, was shot down as he and his wife were walking on the Avenue on their way home. I do not propose to make charges against any officer of the law, but all the evidence I have been able to secure indicates that the only shots fired on that night were fired by the prohibition officer who was trying to arrest two men he suspected as bootleggers. There has been no reliable evidence produced to indicate that the men suspected were violating the law.

They had a copper kettle, which might or might not have been designed as part of a still, and they resisted arrest or ran away, as most of us might be tempted to do when chased by a prohibition officer under the license they exercise here in the National Capital. They were in an alley, and Senator GREENE was on the broad avenue. The Senator was shot; the prohibition officer had a gun, and after the "accident" four chambers of his gun were empty. One of our colleagues here saw the "accident" and has testified that the only shots fired were by the officer. Granted that it was an accidental shooting of a Senator, it is the system of license granted to these enforcement officers that is responsible for the deplorable affair.

The Coast Guard would not have fired at alleged bootleggers in a dark alley and hit a Senator out on the Avenue, so while we are about it we might substitute the Coast Guard for the Prohibition Bureau and give the guard complete control of the effort to enforce the law.

But this accident to Senator GREENE was not an isolated case. The enforcement officers have time and again chased alleged bootleggers through the busiest down-town streets, shooting recklessly, as well as violating all traffic regulations and endangering the lives of scores and even hundreds of innocent citizens. These prohibition sleuths appear to have been imported from the mountains of Kentucky and North Carolina, where they had some experience in potting "moonshiners," and they operate in the congested area of the city as they did in the lonely mountains, shooting at a head whenever they could on the theory that only lawless "moonshiners" inhabited the region. And I think we might admit that to the prohibition-enforcement officer all men—yes, all women and children—are criminals until they have proven to the prohibition unit that they are innocent.

It appears that Congress has become a rather cheap institution when a Senator can be shot down on the street by a prohibition officer and that officer permitted to continue in his official position even when the life of the Senator was hanging by a thread, surrounded by the ablest physicians of the city and with his family notified that the end might come at any time.

To my absolute disgust, the complacency with which both branches of Congress have looked upon that disaster is something I have never heard of in my public life. The life of a Senator was as nothing to the work of the prohibition officer, who was promptly bailed out of the District police station, that he might continue his raiding in the search for evidence of Volsteadian crime.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I yield the gentleman five additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts is recognized for five additional minutes.

Mr. GALLIVAN. Manslaughter is not a crime to be compared to that of being suspected of violating the Volstead law.

Mr. CRAMTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GALLIVAN. Yes.

Mr. CRAMTON. I wonder whether the gentleman from Massachusetts was distressed by the complacency to which he has referred or by the failure of those who are opposed to the enforcement of the law——

Mr. GALLIVAN. I yielded for a question and did not yield for a speech. I refuse to yield any further.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield further.

Mr. CRAMTON. The gentleman recognizes I am present.

Mr. GALLIVAN. Sit down, please. Wayne Wheeler is talking.

In the days of King James II the order of the King was sufficient to take a man's estates, his wife and daughters, and his life. We have reached a condition under prohibition that borders on that old autocracy. The prohibition commissioner or his subordinates give the order to search homes without warrants, arrest innocent people simply on suspicion of ignorant and violently reckless men who assume to be the law—not only the prohibition law, but all law—ignore such law as they find inconvenient to their purposes and apply their own will or their momentary whim.

I am in favor of law enforcement, but in a lawful way, and with the full body of the law taken into consideration, and by responsible and intelligent officials, not by men who use guns so recklessly and so ignorantly as to shoot a Senator, out on Pennsylvania Avenue, when aiming at a suspected bootlegger running the other way. If we are to hand a part of prohibition enforcement over to the Coast Guard, let us give the whole job over to the Guard, and I can assure you from my acquaintance that when they shoot at a suspected bootlegger going north they will not hit a Senator on the street to the south. Coast Guard men go after the object they have in view, whether it is a wrecked ship or a poor, drowning man in the sea, or a smuggler who is trying to get away from the clutches of the law. And they will not shoot lawmakers when they are sent to catch lawbreakers.

As I have said before, this Volstead law was to be accepted as a great boon to the people who were waiting impatiently for the action of Congress, as the children of Israel waited for Moses to bring them down from the mountain the tables of stone on which the Almighty had written the law. Volsteadism was to be the new civilization and the people were to fall down and worship it and its promoters with never a question as to its heavenly origin. It was to enforce itself without a dollar of expense to the taxpayers, but we have appropriated about $50,000,000 for the expenses of the prohibition unit in the last four years, and are now about to appropriate a paltry $14,000,000 to enable the Coast Guard to stop the smuggling of liquor from all parts of the world, check the wildest debauchery of intemperance we have ever known and the greatest increase of crime that has ever followed any action of Congress in the way of legislation for the general welfare. If the Coast Guard is to restore respect for law and try to make the Volstead law effective, let us appropriate a hundred millions for that old, gallant, courageous institution that it may make a clean job of it. Do not stop with just enough money to make a 10 per cent law enforcement. Make it a hundred per cent enforcement and pay the bill for having enlisted in the effort to make the world moral by legislation. Let us go through with it if we bankrupt the Federal Treasury and the American people. That is what we will have to do before the Volstead law becomes effective under the inefficient organization now in control of enforcement.

Before my friend from Michigan leaves the Chamber I want to ask him, when we reach the bill under the five-minute rule, to increase this appropriation from $14,000,000 to $100,000,000, and then I will gladly vote for it.

Mr. CRAMTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GALLIVAN. For a question.

Mr. CRAMTON. Is the gentleman hoping that if we increase it enough it will eventually be defeated?

Mr. GALLIVAN. I do not think so. I think the autocracy of Wayne Wheeler can do anything in this House with an appropriation. He must get the approval of his leader, though; I know that, and that is the reason he can not now promise me that he will increase this appropriation. [Applause.]

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GALLIVAN. Having mentioned the gentleman, of course, I will yield.

Mr. CRAMTON. And mentioned the gentleman in an offensive manner, because the gentleman from Massachusetts knows as well as I do, and as this House does, that the gentleman from Michigan does not take orders from anyone, and the gentleman from Massachusetts would be very quick to resent it if I were to insinuate that he was taking orders from an organized opposition to law enforcement, and I do not so insinuate.

Mr. GALLIVAN. Mr. Chairman, I am inclined to think that perhaps the gentleman does not take orders, but I think the gentleman has interviews. Personally, I take orders from no one, on this question at any rate, and I know of no organized opposition.

The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON] recently discussed the Charge of the Light Brigade, and I suggest that he do not send the Coast Guard into the jaws of death, into the mouth of hell against rum runners with a paltry $14,000,000 for equipment of staunch ships and guns, for they are the boys who will follow the example of the Charge of the Light Brigade—

> Theirs not to make reply,
> Theirs not to reason why,
> Theirs but to do and die.
> Cannon to right of them,
> Cannon to left of them,
> Cannon in front of them.
> Into the jaws of death,
> Into the mouth of hell
> Rode the six hundred.

We have heard much about the desperate characters engaged in rum running and the heroism of the prohibition officers who have been assigned to this duty; but you propose to send the Coast Guard against the rum pirates with little additional equipment, mostly of small motor boats, and assign to that service the work of cleaning up the mess that prohibition has created for the Government, and I would cheerfully join the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON] in making an appropriation that will enable these men to go into battle with the rum pirates in a way to show that the smuggling of liquor can be stopped, even though bootlegging and moonshining continue to flourish on land and in the prohibition States. If we want to make the punishment fit the crime, let us make the appropriation fit the work to be done.

I have told you already that I will probably vote for this bill, and I want the gentleman from Michigan to know that.

Mr. CRAMTON. Will the gentleman yield so that I may ask a question?

Mr. GALLIVAN. And if he will make it $100,000,000, I will vote for it more gladly and with all my heart, whereas now I am voting for it half-heartedly.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I yield the gentleman from Massachusetts three additional minutes.

Mr. CRAMTON. I just want to ask if the gentleman from Massachusetts was here to-day to vote for the Winslow bill?

Mr. GALLIVAN. Before the gentleman from Michigan came in I explained to the House that for five days I have been sick in bed, and that I am here to-day against my doctor's advice.

Mr. CRAMTON. The gentleman having missed the roll call on this important question, ought not to make insinuations about an absence of mine from the floor for a few minutes, even though the gentleman from Massachusetts might be speaking.

Mr. GALLIVAN. Well, the gentleman is here now and can speak for himself in his own good time. The gentleman knows how to talk and knows where to get thoughts and suggestions. I have to think up my own. [Laughter.]

Mr. CRAMTON. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. GALLIVAN. Yes.

Mr. CRAMTON. The gentleman, perhaps, might be well served if he would locate a source for suggestions.

Mr. GALLIVAN. If the gentleman will give me a tip, I would like to have it.

Mr. CRAMTON. I would be very glad to censor any of the gentleman's speeches he desires.

Mr. GALLIVAN. I have to work overtime sometimes trying to think just what to say that is new. I have made a hundred speeches in this House against the gentleman's position, but I am going to finish my own speech; my own speech.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman is not unique in that, and the gentleman is again trying to cast an underhanded insinuation, and it is not like the gentleman.

Mr. GALLIVAN. Oh, do not get excited.

Mr. CRAMTON. I will say that I make none except my own, and apparently sometimes they get a little under the skin of the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. GALLIVAN. They never hurt me. I do not get any votes for what I say here. I do not think the gentleman gets any votes in his part of the country. I do not know that I get any assistance from any speeches I make here on this subject. I mean political assistance, of course. Whether the gentleman does or not is unknown to me, but he comes from a district where I happen to know, in one part of it, there is plenty of rum for those who want it, and I will compare Boston, as a dry city, with any big city in America. I am not going to say it is bone dry, but when Wayne B. Wheeler told me some months ago that he would have them spitting cotton up in Boston, just to get even with me, he did not frighten me in any way, either mentally or physically or any other way. I am sorry to say there are a few rum runners off the coast of Boston, about 40 miles off, and how they ever get to Boston is beyond me.

I do not know that I have anything else to say, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen. I want to repeat that if the gentleman from Michigan will increase this appropriation to $100,000,000 or even to $50,000,000 I will gladly vote for it. Let us make the Coast Guard what it has always been, efficient all the way down the line. The gentleman knows that Admiral Billard told us that he could not promise when he would clear the seas of rum runners, and once more I must remind the gentleman from Michigan that his party being a home-market party, by this legislation is protecting a home industry, and therefore all the land bootleggers will give three cheers when this bill goes through. [Applause.]

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. VAILE].

Mr. VAILE. Mr. Chairman, the hour is rather late, and I thank the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] for granting me time at this hour of the day. I do not care particularly whether gentlemen stay to listen to me or not, because what I want to say is to be said for my own moral satisfaction. I think it is something that ought to be said.

To-day, or at least to-morrow, there will probably be received by the Senate of the United States the nomination of a new Secretary of the Navy. Why any man should want to take that position when he must know that he will be accorded the fiercest possible kind of effort to discredit and besmirch him as the first of President Coolidge's appointees I can not understand. At all events, he will be a brave man who will take that position, and such bravery ought to be a substantial guaranty to us that he will perform the duties of the office in an honorable and patriotic manner. I do not want the occasion to pass into history without saying a word in behalf of the Secretary who has just retired, Mr. Edwin Denby. I want to express my belief that in Secretary Denby, who the other day resigned from the office of Secretary of the Navy, we have lost an honest, a faithful, and an efficient public servant. [Applause.] I think we have lost a man who has been devoted to his work and devoted to the country, and I think the country will soon realize that. I for one resent the imputation jumped at in a moment of legislative hysteria that any of his acts have been detrimental to the United States. This certainly has not yet been proved, and I do not believe that it ever will or can be proved. His acts in approving the oil leases were at least in accordance with law, in accordance with statutory authority conferred during the preceding administration, and at the instance and request of his predecessor in office, Secretary Daniels.

Secretary Denby, who from his eagerness to help his country, without any thought of his personal glory or advancement, served in the World War as an enlisted man in the Marine Corps, now goes back as a reserve officer in his beloved service. I believe that he carries with him the hearty good wishes of the American people, and that the American people, sound and sensible of heart and mind, are already beginning to resent the injustice which has been done him by the legislative lynch law which seems to have become a congressional habit.

I am very sure that the people of the United States are beginning to resent the contemptible meanness which has recently attempted to attach odium to other public officers on ridiculously inadequate and irrelevant grounds.

There may be some parts of the country where it is possible to drag the name of the President of the United States into an oil scandal because he sent two telegrams to a Washington newspaper man on matters which the very slightest inquiry would have shown to be entirely unconnected with the subject, one of those messages relating to the government of the District of Columbia and the other an ordinary message of civility and courtesy in acknowledgment of a similar one to him.

There may be some parts of the country where the people can be induced to swallow that kind of a pettifogging fraud, but I can hardly believe it. Certainly my own people are not so narrow or so stupid, and one of the strongest campaign arguments I could make would be to ask them if they propose at the next general election to intrust their destiny to men who could commit or indorse such political chicanery. [Applause.]

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I understand the principal connection that the President has with the oil scandal is the fact that he was sworn into his office of President by the light of an oil lamp.

Mr. VAILE. I was going to develop that one subject, and I thank the gentleman for mentioning it. Why do we not get a real scandal about the President while we are about it? Why not draw attention to the President's real connection with the oil interests, a connection and a dependency created at the very instant when he took his oath of office? Have you forgotten that that oath was administered by the light of a kerosene lamp? Just think of it, gentlemen! In the sinister darkness of a New England homestead, yea, even in the small hours of the morning, the favorite time for the initiation of nefarious undertakings, the new President raised his hand in the rays furnished by the Standard Oil Co. or some other arm of the oil octopus.

Oh, my countrymen, how can we endure such a disgrace!

We can not unless we get back to sanity. God grant that may be soon. The country is tired of breathing and moving in the fog of hysteria spread from hearsay, hearsay generated by suspicion, suspicion spawned by malice.

The country wants work from Congress, not political stenchpots. [Applause.]

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Illinois yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Is it the purpose of the gentleman to continue with the consideration of this bill to-morrow?

Mr. MADDEN. It is. It is possible that we may have to give way to the Pension Committee at some time during the day for a short time. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. LEHLBACH, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 7449, the first deficiency appropriation bill, fiscal year 1924, and had come to no resolution thereon.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 53 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, March 14, 1924, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

398. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, report on preliminary examination of Bellingham Harbor, Wash.; to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

399. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, reports on preliminary examinations and survey of Onancock River, Va. (H. Doc. No. 219); to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and ordered to be printed.

400. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, report on preliminary examination of Puyallup River, Wash., with a view to preparing plans and estimates of cost for the prevention and control of floods on said river and its tributaries, and to determining the extent to which the United States and local interests should cooperate in carrying out any plans recommended (H. Doc. No. 220); to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and ordered to be printed, with map.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Chaffee, one of its clerks, announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on certain amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 5078) making appropriations for the Department of the Interior for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1925, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the House receded from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 36, and 58, to the said bill (H. R. 5078); that the House receded from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 47 and 60, and concurred therein each with an amendment, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate; that the House insisted upon its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 38, and 39, and requested a further conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the Houses thereon, and that Mr. CRAMTON, Mr. MURPHY, and Mr. CARTER were appointed managers on the part of the House at the further conference.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (S. 684) to authorize the coinage of 50-cent pieces in commemoration of the commencement on June 18, 1923, of the work of carving on Stone Mountain, in the State of Georgia, a monument to the valor of the soldiers of the South, which was the inspiration of their sons and daughters and grandsons and granddaughters in the Spanish-American and World Wars, and in memory of Warren G. Harding, President of the United States of America, in whose administration the work was begun, and the bill was subsequently signed by the Presiding Officer [Mr. WADSWORTH] as Acting President pro tempore.

INTERIOR DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I desire to give notice now that if a session of the Senate is held to-morrow I shall call up this report for action. I would have done it at this time, but the junior Senator from Arizona [Mr. CAMERON] is absent for the day, and he asked me that action on the report be deferred until to-morrow for that reason.

Mr. WARREN. It is the report on the Interior Department appropriation bill to which the Senator refers?

Mr. SMOOT. It is.

Mr. FLETCHER. It would not be conclusive in any case, because the House asks for a further conference.

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly. All amendments are agreed to with the exception of Nos. 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 38, and 39. It is only a partial report.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a statement given in a letter addressed to the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] written by the Senator from Arizona [Mr. CAMERON], with respect to an item in the Interior Department appropriation bill now in conference.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MARCH 14, 1924.

Hon. REED SMOOT,
Chairman Senate Conference on H. R. 5078,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR: On March 11 the House receded from its disagreement to the Senate amendment No. 47 and concurred therein with an amendment as follows:

> "In lieu of the matter proposed to be stricken out by said amendment insert: 'For the construction of trails within the Grand Canyon National Park, $100,000, to be immediately available and to remain available until expended: Provided, That said sum may be used by the Secretary of the Interior for the purchase from the county of Coconino, Ariz., of the Bright Angel Toll Road and Trail within said park, under such terms and conditions as he may deem proper, and the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to construct an approach road from the National Old Trails Highway to the south boundary of said park.'"

The amendment is objectionable on the following grounds:

1. Under the statutes of the State of Arizona the said Bright Angel Toll Road and Trail can not be purchased by the Secretary of the Interior for the United States from the county of Coconino and any negotiations between the Secretary of the Interior and the county of Coconino would be futile.

2. A new trail from the rim to the bottom of the canyon is not necessary for the reason that there are three accessible trails from the rim to the bottom of the canyon at the present time, two of which are in use, of which one belongs to the National Park Service, and the third, belonging to the National Park Service, is available for use if necessary.

3. There is no paramount necessity for appropriating this sum for a duplication of a road or trail for public use which is being adequately served at the present time, and the capacity of the present road or trails will serve the public for many years to come.

The legal objections to the original item were clearly pointed out to the Secretary of the Interior in a letter addressed to him under date of July 16, 1923 (see CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, March 11, 1924, p. 4003); but notwithstanding such objections the board of supervisors entered into such illegal contract "in accordance with the letter dictated by Government officials and others while in conference," and these facts were withheld by these Government officials from the Congress when the original item in the appropriation bill was presented.

The report of the Secretary of the Interior stated: "No part of this sum will be paid over to the county until a satisfactory deed has been executed and delivered, vesting full and complete title in the trail in the United States." This statement was clearly intended to convey the idea that the county of Coconino was to receive the $100,000 provided for in the bill, whereas as a matter of fact there was no intention on the part of the Government to pay the county of Coconino one cent, and the only thing the county was to receive was an indefinite promise that the Government would spend $100,000 on a road some time in the remote future.

The objections to the original item can be applied to the amendment, as above stated, and in addition thereto it is to be pointed out that the said item was not included in the Budget as recommended by the Bureau of the Budget.

It would seem, therefore, that the policy of the Congress being to retrench all expenditures, even to denying relief to a large body of citizens in great need, it is difficult to understand the imperative necessity of departing from that policy in this particular case, and appropriating large sums of money for the duplication of a road or trail which meets all the requirements of the public at the present time.

With kind personal regards, I remain

Sincerely yours, RALPH H. CAMERON.

ADDRESS BY SENATOR COPELAND.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an address delivered by the Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND] at Memorial Hall, Washington, D. C., February 22, 1924, on the life and character of George Washington.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WADSWORTH in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

The address is as follows:

GEORGE WASHINGTON, FIRST IN PEACE.

(By Senator ROYAL S. COPELAND at Memorial Hall, Washington, D. C. February 22, 1924.)

This is the anniversary of a great man's birth. Like every anniversary, it should be made the occasion for serious meditation. To-day we will consider some of the things for which this man stood. I want to talk about him as a man of peace, because after all it was his work for peace which should make the greatest appeal to us.

We think of George Washington as a soldier and as a statesman, but whoever thinks of him as a tiller of the soil? Had you lived in his time and asked him about his calling he would have replied at once, "I am a farmer."

As a matter of fact, Washington was one of the leading and one of the most successful farmers of his generation. Much of his time during the day he was in the saddle, personally superintending the cultivation of his estate. Dusk and bad weather found him at his farm records.

George Washington was a prudent and painstaking farmer. He kept books and checked up on his agricultural results. He could tell to the fraction of a shilling what his labors were accomplishing.

With the close of the Revolution he returned with vigor to the duties of his farm. One of the writers of his own period describes Washington's activities, saying:

> "The improvement of American husbandry enjoyed his close attention, and in the prosecution of plans adapted to the purpose he entered into correspondence with distinguished European agriculturists. The result of this information and of his own experience he applied to amend his farming implements, to improve his breed of cattle, and in various experiments suited to the soil he cultivated. The plans which succeeded with him he recommended to the farmers around him."

Everybody knows the story of Washington's military exploits and of his career in the President's chair. We know he was "first in war" and "first in the hearts of his countrymen." To-day let us study the man who was "first in peace."

Upon a platform supplied by the Declaration of Independence was fought the Revolutionary War. But with the end of that war and the retirement of General Washington to Mount Vernon it was discovered that the declaration was not a sufficient foundation upon which to build a nation. More was required than the formulation of high-minded and inspiring convictions about government. Something more was demanded to furnish the cohesion needed by the States and the proper exercise of their new-found freedom.

During this period the States floated about like a lot of ships adrift on the ocean. When one became conscious of another it was because of the shock of contact. There was comfort only in the absence of contact.

To Washington and the other thinking men of the time this was a period fraught with greater dangers and discouragement than the exciting years of the great conflict. They appeared to feel that war was less to be dreaded than the unsatisfactory peace which followed.

Washington became discouraged. Almost before anybody else he became a nationalist. No longer did he think in the terms of his own State or Colony, but he came to appreciate that there must be a more complete union between the States in order to cope successfully with the new conditions.

On one occasion he wrote to Hamilton:

> "It is clearly my opinion, unless Congress have powers competent to all general purposes, that the distresses we have encountered, the expense we have incurred, and the blood we have spilt will avail us nothing."

In another letter to Hamilton he said:

> "My wish to see the union of these States established upon liberal and permanent principles and the inclination to contribute my mite in pointing out the defects in the present Constitution are equally great."

This was no new sentiment on the part of Washington. Apparently he had given much thought during the war to the necessity of a close union of the Colonies. Immediately at the close of the Revolution he sent a circular letter to the governors of all the States, pointing out several things which he considered essential to the well-being and even to the existence of the United States as an independent power. I quote what Washington appeared to consider the most important of these suggestions:

> "The prevalence of that pacific and friendly disposition among the people of the United States which will induce them to forget their local prejudices and politics; to make those mutual concessions which are requisite to the general prosperity; and, in some instances, to sacrifice their individual advantages to the interest of the community."

In his last address to the Army he said:

> "Unless the principles of the Federal Government were properly supported and the powers of the Union increased the honor, dignity, and justice of the Nation would be lost forever."

As a matter of fact, there was the most disagreeable feeling between the States. My own State of New York taxed the firewood and vegetables brought into it from New Jersey. In her turn, New Jersey charged New York $1,800 a year for the privilege of having a lighthouse on the Jersey coast to protect New York Harbor. The conditions which had compelled union during the war having disappeared, the States fell apart and acted purely as individual units. For the lack of a money system and money the crops rotted in the fields. High taxes and debts oppressed the people. There was distress everywhere, and those in authority failed utterly to meet the condition.

As time went on Washington grew more and more unhappy over the lack of sympathetic cooperation between the States. On one occasion he suggested that the state of affairs in America had become a stench in the nostrils of Europe. He felt that the war had been a failure because of the lack of permanent accomplishment for the common good, due largely to individual selfishness.

When we read his letter to Congressman Henry Lee, it would seem as if Washington were alive and had written but recently. Listen to his burning words:

> "My opinion [of the Federal Government] is that there is more wickedness than ignorance in the conduct of the States; or, in other words, in the conduct of those who have too much influence in the government of them; and until the curtain is withdrawn and the private views and selfish principles upon which these men act are exposed to public notice, I have little hope of amendment without another convulsion."

Washington was ever thinking about the things having to do with the failure of government. Gradually his ideas crystallized, resulting finally in the conviction that a plan, no matter how radical, must be elaborated to solve the problem of establishing an effective Federal Government.

Jefferson held the same views, and it was to him that Washington communicated his fears, but Jefferson was in Europe. However, Hamilton and Madison joined Washington in a movement to amend the Articles of Confederation. The work of these men cleared the way for the adoption of the Constitution.

It is fortunate for us that instead of resting upon his laurels and settling down to the enjoyment of the rural bliss of Mount Vernon, Washington continued writing appeals. He never stopped advancing arguments for permanent union to the leading men in every State. I say it is fortunate that he held to these views, because with the aid of the limitless influence of Washington it was possible to accomplish the great things which otherwise might have been delayed until it was too late.

Before anything of tangible value grew out of the feelings possessed by Washington and his immediate friends, there came about a rapid decline in the powers and influence of the Congress. The feeling between Washington's own State of Virginia and Maryland became so disagreeable that delegates met at Mount Vernon to arrange a sort of commercial treaty between the two States. Out of this grew the movement to call together representatives of all the States to meet at Annapolis, for the purpose of "taking into consideration the trade of the United States." It was really an economic conference.

Following the Annapolis gathering another convention met at Philadelphia, called for the sole purpose of revising the Articles of Confederation. As the outstanding figure in American life Washington was chosen by unanimous vote to preside over the convention. Here he remained for four months, conducting it through many stormy sessions.

After a month of fruitless debate, Edmund Randolph, of Virginia, moved to set aside the Articles of Confederation and to establish a government founded on a new constitution. For proposals of less significance than this, men have been shot at sunrise. Randolph started a movement which overturned a government and built another on its ruins. He inaugurated a bloodless and successful revolution.

Out of this gathering came the Constitution. The men who wrote it came from States quite as far apart and as unfriendly to each other as the countries of Europe are to-day. With the adoption of the Constitution the discordant and warring individual parts were assembled into a compact, powerful machine. The Union became a reality.

To my mind the accomplishments of Washington in the field of peace are more fruitful, if such a thing can be possible, than in the field of war. To him, certainly as much as to any one man, must be given credit for the American Constitution, the never-failing bulwark of our liberties. No wonder a grateful people having given him first place in war, declared him first in peace. So long as the sun shines on the American flag, George Washington will be first in the hearts of his countrymen and, in my opinion, largely because of his accomplishments for permanent peace.

It is not surprising that in the operation of the new machinery of government there should be found defects. As a matter of fact, several were almost immediately recognized. Ten amendments to the original Constitution, including the Bill of Rights, were proposed at the first session of the Congress in 1789, but by the end of Washington's second term the machine was running smoothly. With the adoption and operation of constitutional government our country became strong at home and respected abroad.

Out of the mass of material which the history of these early years developed there is much we can study with profit and apply to the needs of our own generation. It will not be amiss, I am sure, if to-day we consider the foreign policy of Washington and the final conclusions as to those relationships which the Father of his Country believed should characterize our attitude toward other nations.

It is remarkable, as I have said, how similar are world conditions to-day to the conditions which existed in America during the years following the Revolution. While we have in America a certain degree of prosperity, the rest of the globe is in turmoil. Economic disaster is staring in the face many a nation on the other side of the ocean. I want to speak about our relationship to these foreign lands, because Washington thought about them and wrote about them.

FOREIGN RELATIONS.

It is human to stand aloof from great world questions. Their very magnitude frightens us. We hesitate to approach them in the way we attack the little problems of our own households. We scurry away when the troubles of the great round world are mentioned. Is not this attitude of mind merely an unusual expression of stage fright?

Let us study the world disease exactly as we would a simple little incident in our daily walk. What are some of the conclusions we would reach?

Hunger, broken rest, the stress and strain of mental and physical want—these make for restlessness, irritability, quarrelsomeness, and war. Every school-teacher, every parent knows that the way to keep children from quarreling and the way to make them happy is to keep them busy. Men are like children and nations are like groups of children.

To restore peace, to obliterate the scars of the Great War, to wipe out hatred, to calm the fears and agitation of the world's mind, there must be found a way to put the world back to work.

The present trouble of Europe is not war or the fear of war—it is the discontent born of idleness. What the world needs is work. It needs to be busy. Nothing makes for contentment of mind like pleasing occupation, with a fair share of the profits, and the certainty of unfailing income.

Hunger, disease, undernourishment of children, social unrest, interrupted education, mental stunting, and broken lives are found throughout the earth. They must be replaced by health, vigor, and happiness, which are the natural outcome of peace, industrial activity, and freedom to work and to earn.

The business, the industry, the commerce of the world must be reestablished. What statesmen should do, it seems to me, is to find the least common denominator upon which they can agree and then proceed to settle the world's economic troubles by the accepted formula.

To my mind this is a page from the book we should study just now. It may be the elementary arithmetic of politics, but at least it presents something which can be understood by everybody.

Our farmers want markets for their surplus grain. Our manufacturers wish to dispose of their products. Our merchants hunt markets for their goods. Our ships await cargoes. Our railroads seek freight. More than this, our citizens pray for a permanency in prosperity, and want nothing to interfere with the steady flow of the streams of trade and commerce throughout the world.

There is nothing remarkable in this diagnosis of American desires. Neither is our feeling different from the impulses and desires of the citizens of every other country on earth. Undoubtedly our view is shared by men everywhere.

Even if the sentiment of the dominating group is against entrance into some sort of an association of nations, is America to shirk the leadership the world looks to us to assume?

Even though we should assume the correctness of the statement often repeated that America is unwilling to enter into a permanent political alliance with nations across the ocean, are we on this account to be purely negative in our national attitude? Will somebody tell me why some present effort is not being made to deal with the world's difficulties, not from a political standpoint, not with the idea of permanent alliance but solely and wholly to restore economic prosperity to the world? Why not seek to revive national and world business, to rehabilitate the commerce of the world, and to wipe out international hatred by replacing it with that contentment and peace of mind associated with economic or business activity?

No matter what may have been possible immediately after the armistice—no matter what may be possible next year or in the next decade—the fact remains that the immediate need of the world, of our world, is for all of the world to get back to work.

My immediate appeal is for an attempt at economic agreement, regardless of political differences and intrigues. The most bitter opponent of the League of Nations can not object to the consideration of a plan for the economic rehabilitation of the world. The most ardent supporter of the league, after these years of deferred hope and endless disappointment, can not object to a brief departure from the original program. It will be a period during which heated feelings may cool and engendered hatreds may be buried.

In certain lines in America we have prosperity, but the idleness of the rest of the world should warn us that our prosperity is likely to be transient. We must not disregard the warnings given by the economic signals. All the signs indicate approaching financial, commercial, and industrial depression. I should consider him a very poor guardian of the public health if the official waited until the disease entered the city before preparing to combat it. It is the duty of statesmen, too, to anticipate events and to escape national disaster by early and effective action.

In my opinion the surest guaranty against this imminent peril is the calling of an immediate economic conference—a world conference. Such a conference should not be limited to the major nations. It should include them all, old and new, eastern, western, and central.

From every viewpoint, it seems to me, the world must welcome a proposal for a business and economic conference. The diplomats of all nations have tried to settle these problems. They have failed. The Government has neglected to use our tremendous moral, political, and economic influence to bring about a settlement of the world's economic troubles. Yet who can doubt that our country should take the initiative?

Let it be understood that such an economic arrangement as I propose is for a limited time and for a single purpose—the rehabilitation of the world's industry and commerce. No other consideration should be permitted to mar the purpose of this movement.

In Washington's Farewell Address, in the paragraph immediately preceding the one where he so touchingly speaks of his advice as "the counsels of an old and affectionate friend," he uses language I wish to quote. It is as follows:

> "Harmony, liberal intercourse with all nations are recommended by policy, humanity, and interest. But even our commercial policy should hold an equal and impartial hand, neither seeking nor granting exclusive favors or preferences; consulting the natural course of things; diffusing and diversifying by gentle means the streams of commerce, but forcing nothing; establishing with powers so disposed, in order to give trade a stable course, to define the rights of our merchants, and to enable the Government to support them, conventional rules of intercourse, the best that present circumstances and mutual opinion will permit, but temporary and liable to be from time to time abandoned or varied as experience and circumstances shall dictate; constantly keeping in view that it is folly for one nation to look for disinterested favors from another."

These are exactly the things I have in mind as necessary for immediate adoption—temporary arrangements, building up, or to use Washington's quaint phrase, "establishing with powers so disposed, such economic stimulation as will set flowing again the streams of commerce." It seems to me such action would insure harmony, liberal intercourse with nations, and certainly such action is recommended by policy, humanity, and interest.

I wish we might turn aside from our accustomed and predominating political beliefs just long enough to take stock of present economic conditions.

If a great fire is raging and a city block is threatened with destruction, we do not hold a convention to determine what form of fire apparatus should be purchased and what method of administrative control should be used in the fire department. First, we employ every facility at hand to put out the fire. When the immediate conflagration is ended we will sit down to discuss the larger and permanent policy of the city with regard to the department.

It seems to me this country can not afford to shirk the responsibility of making every possible attempt to have determined an economic policy for the world. Surely there is a way to accomplish this. It is very probable that by "gentle means," to quote Washington, we may open the streams of commerce.

Is it not worth while to try? What finer thing could be accomplished? We have the moral force, born of conviction as to our duty, to take up arms against our sea of troubles and by united economic effort to relieve the misery of the world.

What a joy it would be to that man who has just left us if we could have made a start toward the goal of peace he never permitted to leave his gaze. Woodrow Wilson was the greatest of the casualties of the Great War, a martyr to his cosmic outlook. He will remain forever in the national mind as bound in links of peace to that other great American, George Washington.

I prefer to think of Washington as a man of peace. His moral life and his every instinct made him such. He stands out as a mountain peak among the heroes of peace.

Once I stood on Rigi's top awaiting that most wonderful of all human experiences, a sunrise in the Swiss Alps. Fog and mist obscured everything, and an object a dozen feet away looked distorted and grotesque.

Groping my way through the dim light, I reached a place which my guide said was the highest point, the tiptop of the mountain. Here I stood shivering in the cold, awaiting the arrival of Old Sol. Off in the east was no sign of sunrise.

Hearing an exclamation, I turned to see a mountain top away off to the west, higher than the rest, and first to catch the outriding rays of the orb of day. There, clothed in the robes of golden morning, stood the Jungfrau, the young bride, in dazzling costume, awaiting the coming of the bridegroom.

The sun rose higher, yet still it was below the level of Mount Rigi. The tips of other mountains, one here and one there, came into view, like points of golden nails driven from the clouds and mists beneath by the unseen hand of some mighty giant.

I turned again to face the east as the sun rose above the horizon, sending its shafts across valley and stream. It gilded the waterfalls and sparkled upon the glaciers. The fairest of all fair landscapes came into glorious view. In a world where the Jungfrau stood alone were to be seen hundreds of other giant mountains, all bathed in the glorious sunshine of a day of marvelous promise.

In the year 1924 we stand in a high place from which to view the landscape of history. Where is the outstanding figure, the one first to catch the rays of the sun of liberty? Towering above all the rest of the giant characters, there stands out, head and shoulders above all the rest, the majestic figure of George Washington, the Father of his Country.

He was first in war, first in peace, and forever, friends, he will continue to be first in the hearts of his countrymen.

TREATY WITH COLOMBIA (S. DOC. NO. 64).

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was read:

To the Senate:

I transmit herewith a report from the Secretary of State, with accompanying papers, in response to the Senate's resolution of February 13, 1924, requesting him to furnish the Senate with copies of all diplomatic correspondence, if not incompatible with the public interest, in connection with the ratification of the treaty concluded between the United States and Colombia on April 6, 1914, and in connection with the securing of any oil concessions for American citizens or corporations organized and doing business in the United States, between this Government and the Government of Colombia.

CALVIN COOLIDGE.

THE WHITE HOUSE, March 14, 1924.

Mr. LODGE. I ask that the message of the President and the accompanying papers may be printed and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, I did not understand the request.

Mr. LODGE. I ask that the message and accompanying papers may be printed for the use of the Senate and referred in the usual course to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. DILL. The message and papers relate to a subject of particular interest to the Public Lands Committee, and I think that committee should be able to utilize them.

Mr. LODGE. It is wholly a matter of foreign relations.

Mr. DILL. The subject has been before the Public Lands Committee.

Mr. LODGE. It relates to a treaty, I understand.

Mr. DILL. It relates to the treaty with Colombia, but I had particularly in mind in offering the resolution the connection of former Secretary Fall with the Colombian treaty. That matter came before the Public Lands Committee. I wonder if there is not some method by which the papers could be sent to that committee?

Mr. LODGE. I have asked that the message and papers may be printed. I have merely asked that the matter take the usual course in such cases. There is no intention of depriving the Committee on Public Lands of the use of the papers.

Mr. DILL. I understand that, but I merely wanted to ascertain if there was not some method by which they could be placed before the Committee on Public Lands for study in connection with the oil investigation.

Mr. LODGE. I only followed what I thought the proper course, that papers relating to a treaty should be printed and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. BORAH. The Public Lands Committee could avail themselves of the papers as soon as they were printed.

Mr. LODGE. Absolutely.

Mr. DILL. Will they be printed as a Senate document?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. DILL. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Massachusetts? The Chair hears none, and the message and the accompanying papers will be printed and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. WARREN presented a resolution of General Henry W. Lawton Camp No. 1, United Spanish War Veterans, Department of Colorado and Wyoming, of Denver, Colo., favoring the passage of Senate bill 5, the so-called Bursum pension bill, as amended, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. LODGE presented a resolution of the Grain Board of the Chamber of Commerce, of Boston, Mass., protesting against the passage of Senate bill 2012, declaring an emergency in respect of certain agricultural commodities, to promote equality between agricultural commodities and other commodities, and for other purposes, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. KEYES presented resolutions adopted by the congregations of the Bethany Congregational Church of Rye, and the First Congregational Churches of Wolfboro and Claremont, in the State of New Hampshire, favoring an amendment to the Constitution regulating child labor, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. WILLIS presented a petition, numerously signed, of members of the Girls Club of South High School, of Akron, Ohio, praying for the passage of House Joint Resolution 184, proposing an amendment to the Constitution regulating child labor, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BURSUM presented memorials, numerously signed, of members of the shop associations of the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe Railway system, of Las Vegas, N. Mex., remonstrating against the making of any substantial change in the transportation act of 1920, which were referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

He also presented a resolution of the Chamber of Commerce of Carlsbad, N. Mex., protesting against the making of any amendment to the transportation act of 1920, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the executive board of the New Mexico Cattle and Horse Growers' Association, favoring the passage of legislation extending the time within which to return livestock taken into the Republic of Mexico for temporary pasturage purposes, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. CAPPER, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (S. 81) for the relief of the owners of the steamship Lexington (Rept. No. 248);

A bill (S. 362) for the relief of Frank Grygla (Rept. No. 249); and

A bill (S. 763) for the relief of G. T. and W. B. Hastings, partners, trading as Hastings Bros. (Rept. No. 250).

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 606) for the relief of Orin Thornton, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 251) thereon.

Mr. JONES of Washington (for Mr. EDGE), from the Committee on Commerce, to which was referred the bill (S. 2390) to provide and adjust penalties for violation of the navigation laws, and for other purposes, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 252) thereon.

Mr. BROOKHART, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (S. 1017) for the relief of Florence Proud, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 253) thereon.

Mr. WADSWORTH (Mr. JONES of Washington in the chair), from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 2450) to amend section 2 of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation act, approved July 31, 1894, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 254) thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill (S. 2299) to validate the payment of commutation of quarters, heat, and light under the act of April 16, 1918, and of rental and subsistence allowances under the act of June 10, 1922, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 255) thereon.

INTERNATIONAL INSTITUTE OF AGRICULTURE.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, from the Committee on Foreign Relations I report back favorably with an amendment the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 96) authorizing appropriations for the payment of expenses of delegates to represent the United States at the general assembly of the International Institute of Agriculture, to be held at Rome in May, 1924, and for the payment of the quotas of Hawaii, the Philippines, Porto Rico, and the Virgin Islands for the support of the institute for the calendar year 1924, and I submit a report (No. 247) thereon. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the joint resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WADSWORTH in the chair). The Secretary will read the joint resolution for the information of the Senate.

The reading clerk read the joint resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. FLETCHER. What is the total amount of the appropriation?

Mr. LODGE. Fifteen thousand dollars.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, the joint resolution, I think, should pass. The purposes of the International Institute of Agriculture are set forth in the convention signed on June 7, 1906, which provides that the institute shall collect, study, and publish as promptly as possible statistical, technical, and economic information concerning farming, both vegetable and animal products, the commerce in agricultural products, and the prices prevailing in the various markets; also shall communicate to parties interested all the information thus collected; indicate the wages paid for farm work; make known the new diseases of vegetables which may appear in any part of the world, showing the territories infected, the progress of the diseases, and, if possible, the remedies which are effective in combating them; study questions concerning agricultural cooperation, insurance, and credit in all their aspects; collect and publish information which might be useful in the various countries in the organization of works connected with agricultural cooperation, insurance, and credits; and submit to the approval of the Governments, if there is occasion for them, measures for the protection of the common interests of farmers and for the improvement of their condition.

The field covered by the Agricultural Institute is very broad. Its work is important, and I think it should be continued.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I would like to ask the Senator from Massachusetts why the joint resolution should come here now, making an appropriation for this purpose, when it usually comes in the State Department appropriation bill? It has been the rule heretofore to provide for it in the diplomatic and consular appropriation bill.

Mr. LODGE. That would make it impossible for the delegates to attend the institute. They have to leave inside of three weeks.

Mr. OVERMAN. Oh, that is the reason? It is to give a trip to Rome for delegates, and they can not wait until the general appropriation is made.

Mr. LODGE. I am going to submit an amendment to the deficiency appropriation bill to cover the item. I shall not wait for the State Department appropriation bill.

Mr. SMITH. What number of delegates are we supposed to send?

Mr. ROBINSON. Nine, I think.

Mr. LODGE. Yes; I think there are nine. We have maintained this practice since 1906.

Mr. FLETCHER. But we have always had what we called a permanent delegate to the International Institute of Agriculture, have we not?

Mr. LODGE. We have, and those appropriations are placed in the regular bills every year, and will be this year.

Mr. FLETCHER. I do not think we have been sending delegates to that convention other than the permanent delegate.

Mr. LODGE. They have only held the convention at intervals of five years.

Mr. OVERMAN. And this is the fifth year?

Mr. LODGE. The appropriation is just for this year.

Mr. FLETCHER. The institute was established through the efforts of Mr. David Lubin. Mr. Lubin was very greatly interested in it. He was a distinguished citizen of California, and the last years of his life were devoted to the maintenance and success of this great institute.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. Lubin is now dead. Who has taken his place?

Mr. LODGE. I do not recall the name of the person who was his successor.

Mr. FLETCHER. If the Senator will permit me to finish my statement, Mr. Lubin caused the institute to be established through his efforts with the King of Italy, and the permanent building there was constructed at the expense of the King of Italy and paid for by him.

Mr. LODGE. It was paid for by Italy.

Mr. FLETCHER. I thought it was a very great work, and I have always thought so. It was the one institution that kept going even during the World War. There are, I think, some fifty-two or sixty nations participating in this work. I still think it is important, and, as I have stated, I was under the impression that we kept a permanent delegate there.

Mr. LODGE. We do so, but I can not tell the Senator who succeeded Mr. Lubin. However, we have a permanent representative there who is provided for in the regular appropriation bill.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. Lubin contracted the influenza in the fall or winter of 1918, as I recall, and died.

Mr. LODGE. Yes.

Mr. FLETCHER. After that, I think he was succeeded by a representative of the Consular Service or some other representative of the Government stationed in Rome.

Mr. LODGE. I do not remember as to that for the moment.

Mr. FLETCHER. I did not know that any permanent representative had been appointed.

Mr. OVERMAN. I should like to make an inquiry of the Senator from Florida, who knows a great deal about this matter. I remember that he and I discussed it some time ago. The permanent delegate, Mr. Lubin, having died, I inquire who has taken his place, and how is the permanent delegate selected?

Mr. FLETCHER. He is selected by the State Department.

Mr. OVERMAN. Who has been appointed?

Mr. FLETCHER. I do not know who he is.

Mr. LODGE. I think we have a permanent representative there, but I do not know who holds that place at this moment.

Mr. FLETCHER. It was arranged, I think, on the death of Mr. Lubin, that either our consul general or consular agent or some other officer of that kind should be designated to take Mr. Lubin's place as a representative of this Government.

Mr. LODGE. I think so; that is my impression.

Mr. FLETCHER. Since then, I take it, a permanent delegate has been appointed, but I do not know who he is.

Mr. LODGE. They have not held a convention since the World War, I think.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, the convention meets in May, as I understand.

Mr. LODGE. Yes.

Mr. SWANSON. Unless we provide this appropriation now it will be impossible to have our delegates attend the convention. The amount involved is only $15,000, and I am satisfied we will secure a great deal of valuable information, which could be used here in connection with various phases of farm life and farm production. It seems to me that it would almost be folly not to avail ourselves of the information that has been accumulated there during the years in connection with the agricultural conditions in Europe.

Mr. OVERMAN. I remember we had a long discussion about this matter several years ago, and I understand it is the opinion of the Senator from Massachusetts that by reason of an existing treaty we are required to send delegates and help to maintain this permanent institution?

Mr. LODGE. There was, I think, a convention under which the institute was established.

Mr. OVERMAN. I understood the Senator from Massachusetts so to state; and there is a convention held every five years to carry out the treaty.

Mr. LODGE. Yes; and the delegates proposed to be provided for in this joint resolution are special delegates and not general delegates.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution, which had been reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations with an amendment, on page 1, line 3, after the word "hereby," to strike out the words "authorized to be," so as to make the joint resolution read:

Resolved, etc., That there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $10,045, or so much thereof as may be necessary, for the payment of expenses of delegates to represent the United States at the next general assembly of the International Institute of Agriculture, to be held at Rome in May, 1924, to be expended under the direction and in the discretion of the Secretary of State, and the sum of $5,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, for the payment of the quotas of Hawaii, the Philippines, Porto Rico, and the Virgin Islands for the support of the International Institute of Agriculture for the calendar year 1924.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A joint resolution making appropriations for the payment of expenses of delegates to represent the United States at the general assembly of the International Institute of Agriculture, to be held at Rome in May, 1924, and for the payment of the quotas of Hawaii, the Philippines, Porto Rico, and the Virgin Islands for the support of the institute for the calendar year 1924."

DELEGATES TO INTERNATIONAL INSTITUTE OF AGRICULTURE.

Mr. LODGE, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, reported an amendment intended to be proposed to House bill 7449, the first deficiency appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed, as follows:

For the payment of expenses of delegates to represent the United States at the next general assembly of the International Institute of Agriculture, to be held at Rome in May, 1924, to be expended under the direction and in the discretion of the Secretary of State, the sum of $10,045, or so much thereof as may be necessary, and for the payment of the quotas of Hawaii, the Philippines, Porto Rico, and the Virgin Islands for the support of the International Institute of Agriculture for the calendar year 1924, the sum of $5,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

INVESTIGATION OF DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY SPECIAL COMMITTEE.

Mr. KEYES, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to which had been referred the resolution (S. Res. 189) submitted by Mr. BROOKHART on the 11th instant, reported it without amendment, and it was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That Senate Resolution No. 157, agreed to February 29, 1924, be, and the same hereby is, amended to authorize the select committee created by said resolution, or any subcommittee thereof, to sit and perform its duties at such times and places as may be deemed advisable or necessary by said committee, and to empower the chairman of said select committee, or any member thereof, to summon witnesses by subpœna or otherwise and to administer oaths to them.

WILLIAM J. DONALD.

Mr. KEYES. From the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate I report back favorably without amendment Senate Resolution 172.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be read.

The resolution (S. Res. 172) submitted by Mr. WARREN on February 26, 1924, was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to pay out of the contingent fund of the Senate to William J. Donald the sum of $228.33, being the amount received by him per month as clerk to the Hon. Samuel D. Nicholson, late a Senator from the State of Colorado.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Hampshire desire that the resolution go to the calendar?

Mr. PHIPPS. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the resolution. It is a very small matter, and I think the resolution should be adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. KING. May I inquire of the Senator from Colorado whether this is to continue the pay beyond the usual period?

Mr. PHIPPS. No; it merely provides one month's pay for a deceased Senator's secretary.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I will inquire what is the resolution? My attention was diverted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is a resolution directing the Secretary of the Senate to pay to William J. Donald one month's salary as a clerk of the Hon. Samuel D. Nicholson, late a Senator from Colorado.

Mr. HARRISON. I have no objection to the resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 98) authorizing the President to extend an invitation for the holding of the Third World's Poultry Congress in the United States in 1927, and to extend invitations to foreign governments to participate in this congress; to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

REDUCTION OF TAXATION.

Mr. McNARY submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to House bill 6715, the revenue bill, which was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed.

LOAN TO FRANCE.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I submit a resolution which I ask may be read, and lie on the table.

The resolution (S. Res. 191) was read, and ordered to lie on the table, as follows:

Whereas the French Government owes the United States $3,990,657,605.64; and

Whereas notwithstanding more than five years have elapsed since that debt was incurred and no part of the principal or interest has been paid; and

Whereas it seems that the French Government declines to submit any proposal for the settlement or give any indication of a willingness to adjust it, thereby in effect repudiating said debt; and

Whereas France is now maintaining a vast military establishment, having an army of some 700,000 men and the largest and most effective airplane force in the world; and

Whereas France, by her invasion of the Ruhr, manifests a determination to destroy Germany; and

Whereas it is represented in the public press that J. P. Morgan & Co. and other bankers are now loaning to France through the Bank of France some hundred million dollars: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be requested to advise the Senate, if not incompatible with the public interests:

First. Whether the State Department was in any way advised or consulted relative to said loan of J. P. Morgan & Co.; and if so, whether the said loan is being made with the approval or consent, express or implied, of the State Department.

Second. What, if anything, in the way of a policy or program, has the State Department relative to bringing about an adjustment or settlement of the French debt.

Third. Has the State Department any assurance in the way of communications from the French Government of its intention or proposal to submit any plan for the adjustment or settlement of the French debt.

INCOME TAXES OF CORPORATIONS OWNING OIL WELLS.

Mr. KING. I request that Senate Resolution 181, directing the Secretary of the Treasury to report to the Senate the number of corporations which have filed income-tax returns claiming deductions for depletion of oil wells, and so forth, which is now lying upon the table, may be taken from the table and referred to the special committee on investigation of the Internal Revenue Bureau, which was appointed the day before yesterday under the resolution reported by the Committee on Finance, as that committee is charged to make full investigation into these matters.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the request of the Senator from Utah will be approved. The Chair hears no objection.

FINANCIAL CONDITION OF FRANCE.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I send to the desk a short editorial, which I should like to have read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The reading clerk read as follows:

[From the Chicago Journal of Commerce of March 12, 1924.]

WHAT FRANCE MUST DO.

Amid the reports that have arisen during the fall of the franc is one that a group of American banks is making a $50,000,000 ninety-day bank loan to support the French currency. Would such a loan save the franc?

Fifty million dollars is a mere drop in the bucket when used for such a purpose. The franc is worth about 2¼ cents on any ordinary gold basis. At present it is selling for about 2¼ cents. This low quotation is a sign that the trouble with the French currency is too fundamental to be affected by a small, temporary bank loan.

Banks do not loan their own money directly except on good, liquid collateral. If a 90-day loan is being made, presumably it is to be paid at the end of 90 days or after one or two renewals. Repayment at such a time would annul the benefits of the original payment. It might even do worse than restore the evil conditions of the present, for probably it would be harder for France to repay the loan than to disburse $50,000,000 now for purchase of francs.

The fundamental trouble is that France has imposed on herself an inflation of bonded indebtedness such as no nation ever before experienced. The figures of currency inflation, taken alone, are misleading, because the inflation which is harassing France is one of funded indebtedness rather than of money.

The franc lost stability when French troops entered the Ruhr as bailiffs. Until then France had been receiving reparations which, while less than she was entitled to, were a material aid to her financial position. If she had been content to accept those reparations for the time being and to institute immediate tax reforms, she might have recovered. Instead she went into the Ruhr, and the world lost confidence that France would succeed in obtaining adequate reparation payments and in balancing her budget. With the fall in the world's confidence there came the fall of the franc.

The only thing that will help the franc to-day is abandonment of the whole policy which was forced upon the French Government by the impatient temper of the French people. France must moderate her imperial policy, reduce her armament, and cut her taxes. By thus helping herself she will prove herself worthy of outside help.

THE CALENDAR.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The morning business is closed. The calendar under Rule VIII is in order.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed with the calendar under Rule VIII, beginning with Order of Business No. 167, and that only unobjected bills be considered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. HARRISON. Reserving the right to object, I will state that I desire to occupy the time of the Senate about 5 or 10 minutes.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator can do that on the first bill that is considered.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, I am not going to object to this unanimous-consent request; but the other day the Senate ordered the consideration of Order of Business 111, Senate bill 2111, authorizing the Postmaster General to conduct an experiment in the Rural Mail Service, and for other purposes. I desire to give notice that after the Norris joint resolution is passed this afternoon, if there is time, I shall ask the Senate again to consider that bill.

Mr. CURTIS. I ask that only unobjected bills on the calendar be considered under Rule VIII, beginning with Order of Business 167.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hearing none, the Senate will proceed with the consideration of the calendar, beginning at Order of Business 167.

MEDICINE BOW NATIONAL FOREST, WYO.

The first business on the calendar under the unanimous-consent agreement was the bill (S. 699) authorizing the addition of certain lands to the Medicine Bow National Forest, Wyo., and for other purposes; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President, upon recommendation of the Secretary of Agriculture and the Secretary of the Interior, is hereby authorized to add to the Medicine Bow National Forest the public lands within townships 14 and 15 north, range 77 west, sixth principal meridian, State of Wyoming, which may be determined to be chiefly valuable for national-forest purposes, and to designate as a game refuge within such national forest the areas which may be determined to be suitable for the protection and propagation of game animals and birds.

SEC. 2. That it shall be unlawful for any person to hunt, pursue, kill, capture, or molest any game animal or any bird within such designated refuge except in accordance with rules and regulations of the Secretary of Agriculture.

SEC. 3. That the provisions of this act shall not affect any valid existing claim, location, or entry under the land laws of the United States, whether for homestead, mineral, right of way, or any other purpose, nor the rights of any claimant, locator, or entryman to the full use and enjoyment of such land.

SEC. 4. That any person who violates any provision of this act or of any rule or regulation promulgated hereunder shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined not more than $500 or imprisoned for not more than one year, or both.

RECENT PRESIDENTIAL APPOINTMENTS.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, the same impression is not always created in the country that is created on the minds of Senators by the acts of public officials; and it is with that thought in view that I desire to direct the attention of the country and the Senate to what has been happening during the last few days.

In the morning Post we read that the portfolio of Secretary of the Navy was tendered to ex-Senator Kenyon, and that he declined the offer. Those of us who served with Senator Kenyon here remember his amiable qualities, his high character, his progressive views, and his utterances upon the floor of the Senate, oftentimes being attacks upon the administration leaders and administration measures. Indeed, when he was appointed to his present high official position many thought that it was because they desired to get him out of the Senate, and out of his commanding and influential position as head of the farm bloc. He has filled with distinction the judicial position to which he was appointed; and so they go to this particular individual, who is known in the Middle West and the far West as a man of strong, progressive views and a friend of the people, to give him this Cabinet position.

Mr. President, the President of the United States sometimes does not show very much courage, but he is as smart a politician as has been in the White House in a long time. I hope my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] will not think that I am attacking the President when I pay him that compliment. While we are engrossed in all this oil scandal and daily reading about Roxie Stinson, I believe her name is, and Means, and others, we sometimes are liable to forget what is going on in the White House. The President is playing a smart game. The President's mind is focussed on the presidential primaries and the conventions to select a nominee as the Republican standard bearer this year, and he has not much time to give to these smaller matters in which the Senate and Congress are engaged; and so, in going out to get a Secretary of the Navy, who would be more pleasing to the farmers of the Middle West than this man, who was their champion here so long and held this high position as head of the farm bloc, William S. Kenyon?

The President knew it. Of course, the President did not think of the fact that Kenyon had never been upon the Naval Affairs Committee; that he had never given any particular study to naval affairs; that he was a lawyer of distinction; that he was a judge of high reputation; and that he was a man who understood agricultural conditions well; but he thought that Kenyon would fit in as Secretary of the Navy, not because he was trained in that line of work but because it might help the President in the Middle West and the far West with the farmers of the country and with the progressive element in the conventions and the primaries to come.

But ex-Senator Kenyon understood his own temperament. He knew his training; he knew his fitness; and he knew, too, the crowd that controls affairs to-day, and he did not desire that association, and so Mr. Kenyon said in his statement this morning:

> A man in a judicial position acquires the habit of looking on all sides of a question before arriving at a conclusion. I am appreciative of the honor conferred and confidence shown in tendering me the position of Secretary of the Navy.

Further:

> I have not considered my personal preferences in the matter, as I would be willing to make any sacrifice for real public service. I can not, however, escape the conclusion that I do not possess the qualifications or training for the office.

So he declined it. Now, it was published in the papers that Senator Kenyon was here conferring with the President, it was thought with a view of a tender of the Attorney Generalship to him. He is eminently qualified for that position. His whole training has been along that line. He was a "trust buster" while he was an assistant in the Attorney General's office some years ago, working in behalf of the Federal Government, so he would have made a splendid Attorney General. He would have gone after crooks in high as well as in low places. He would have won the confidence of the American people; but we were fooled. The President was not talking to him about the Attorney Generalship. He was trying to get him to take the job of Secretary of the Navy, and so Kenyon turned it down, and rightly so. If he had been tendered the office of Attorney General I doubt if he would have declined it, in view of the statement made by Senator Kenyon, because he said in that statement that where he could have rendered great public service and he was temperamentally fit for that service he would feel it a call to duty, and he would have accepted it; so

I doubt not that Kenyon would have accepted the Attorney Generalship, but we are now told that nothing was said about that.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. HARRISON. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. There is time enough for that yet.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes; there is time enough for that yet; but knowing the President of the United States as a very adroit politician, I know that he has figured out the exact time in which that request can be made. Let me say to the Senator from Nebraska that the demand for the Attorney General's resignation will not come until after the primaries are held in the Buckeye State, not until they have cinched for the President the electoral vote of Ohio. They are afraid of the Attorney General. There are men on the other side of the Chamber who tremble when the Attorney General comes upon the floor of the Senate. They think the Attorney General has something and he is a fighter.

Mr. STANFIELD. Mr. President——

Mr. HARRISON. The Attorney General has won many friends by the way he has fought, and so the administration is not going to jeopardize the electoral vote of Ohio at this time by demanding Daugherty's resignation; but mark my prediction: If he does not resign before the presidential primary is held in Ohio, within a very short time thereafter the President will demand his resignation.

Now, I yield to my friend from Oregon.

Mr. STANFIELD. Mr. President, does the Senator think that the Attorney General is so popular in his own State that he would control the electoral vote there? Is that the idea?

Mr. HARRISON. I think the Attorney General has a lot of friends in Ohio, and, as I say, he is a fighter.

Mr. STANFIELD. I think the Senator has paid the Attorney General a very fine compliment.

Mr. HARRISON. He is a fighter; there is not any question about that; and he has close friends, and has had close friends around him for a long time, from Jesse Smith down, and they have gone down with him, and they are going down with him.

Mr. STANFIELD. He must have close friends in the State of Ohio, too.

Mr. HARRISON. May I ask the Senator a question? Does not he think that the Attorney General, if he made a fight upon the President in Ohio, would jeopardize the President's chances of getting the vote of the Ohio delegation in the next Republican convention?

Mr. STANFIELD. If all of the things are true that have been taxed to the Attorney General and impugned upon him, I should say that he would not have any influence in the State of Ohio; but the way to find out what a man's true character is is to go into his home. I think the Senator has paid a very fine compliment to the Attorney General when he says that the Attorney General is so popular where he must be best known that he could control the vote of the State.

Mr. HARRISON. But the Senator has not answered my question, and I am going to get an answer from him, because he has projected himself into the discussion. Does not the Senator think that if the President should demand the resignation of Attorney General Daugherty, and Daugherty should return to Ohio with some of his friends of long standing still clinging to him, having been as he has the dominant figure in the Ohio Republican machine for a long time, it would jeopardize the electoral vote of Ohio going for the President?

Mr. STANFIELD. I will say to the Senator from Mississippi that I think that can be best determined when the Senate has concluded its investigation of the Attorney General. I think he is entitled to a hearing; I think he is entitled to a fair judgment; and that can only be obtained after the machinery that we have set in operation—and encroached upon the rights of the Executive, if you please—has functioned. Then it will be sufficient time to determine whether or not the Attorney General should resign.

Mr. HARRISON. But will not the Senator answer my question?

Mr. STANFIELD. I will answer the Senator's question and say that I have an open mind on the subject. I will determine my position in the matter when the reports are in, and we have a chance to go into the evidence; and meantime I think judgment should be withheld. I do not think that this body, the highest legislative body in the country, should sit here day after day listening to propaganda on disputed questions. I think we should bide our time until we have determined the conditions that surround the Attorney General.

Mr. HARRISON. So the Senator does not answer my question. Of course there is no doubt but that the country has condemned the Attorney General. Hardly anyone will question that, but he has friends upon this floor who have stood by him. The distinguished Senator [Mr. WILLIS] who sits to the right of the Senator from Oregon made a very interesting speech here, and spoke eloquently in behalf of the present Attorney General of the United States. But he is condemned in the country. His usefulness as Attorney General has gone.

Mr. STANFIELD. The distinguished Senator from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS], to whom the Senator refers, perhaps knows the Attorney General, who comes from the State of Ohio, better than any other man who sits in this body.

Mr. HARRISON. That may be, but what I was driving at is this—and the Senator evidently agrees with me—that the Attorney General's resignation will not be demanded by the President until after the primaries are held to choose delegates in the State of Ohio.

Mr. STANFIELD. I do not believe the President will be influenced one bit by that.

Mr. HARRISON. Oh, no——

Mr. STANFIELD. I think after the conditions surrounding the Attorney General are developed, then the President will make up his mind, and when his mind is made up as to the justice of any action, action will be taken.

Mr. HARRISON. Of course the President does not give a thought to the choosing of Republican delegates. The President, I suppose, did not give any thought to that when he indorsed the Norbeck bill to give supposed relief to the farmers of the wheat section, the only bill which he has indorsed——

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President——

Mr. HARRISON. The only bill which Senators over there who stood by him could get him to indorse. Senators on the other side of the aisle know that the President indorsed the Norbeck bill——

Mr. CURTIS. A question of order, Mr. President.

Mr. HARRISON. So that he might win the vote of Montana and the Dakotas and of that section of the country against HIRAM JOHNSON in the coming Republican convention.

Now I yield to the Senator.

Mr. CURTIS. I simply want to ask the Chair if, during this hour, debate is not limited to five minutes? The Senator has taken about 15 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The point raised by the Senator from Kansas is well taken.

Mr. HARRISON. Oh, well; the point is well taken, Mr. President, and I will desist, but it will just mean that I will continue when the next bill comes up. I can offer amendments and talk upon each amendment. I know it is not pleasing to my friend from Kansas. I am sorry that it is not. Does the Senator insist upon his point of order?

Mr. CURTIS. The Senator has heard nothing in what the Senator from Mississippi has said that displeases him. I know what he is talking for, and it has no effect upon me whatever.

Mr. HARRISON. I am not camouflaging——

Mr. CURTIS. As far as I am concerned, I am perfectly willing to have the Senator go on and talk himself out. I do know he may take time on the various bills as they come up; but I do think the Senator should take into consideration the condition of this calendar, and let us go on and get through with it.

We have a unanimous-consent agreement to dispose of unobjected bills, and if we can go on until 2 o'clock, we will get through with most of the calendar. The Senator from Mississippi is himself interested in some bills on the calendar.

Mr. HARRISON. I thank the Senator. Does the Senator insist on his point of order?

Mr. CURTIS. I withdraw the point of order.

Mr. HARRISON. I thank the Senator. Now, getting from Ohio and Judge Kenyon over into California, that is a desirable State at this time. The real opponent of the President of the United States for the Republican nomination comes from California. They have many electoral votes out there, and California never received such attention in all the history of this country as it is receiving right now. This morning I received a notice that some nominations had come in. One of the nominations is of a gentleman to be minister to Switzerland. Where did they get that fellow? He is Hugh S. Gibson, a Californian, and he is not of the Hiram Johnson type of Californian.

Then, when Judge Kenyon turned down the portfolio of Secretary of the Navy, it was natural for the President to go to a State in the far west to obtain a Secretary of the Navy, the State which would have the most electoral votes. So he appointed Mr. Wilbur—Judge Wilbur. I inquired of two or three Senators on the other side who know everything about Republican politics in regard to Judge Wilbur, and they had never heard of him. But you can bank on it, Mr. President, that he is not of the Hiram Johnson type.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield.

Mr. DILL. I want to remind the Senator, in that connection, that only a few days ago the President sent to the Senate the name of a California attorney, Mr. Knight, although he is an attorney who represents the Equitable Life Assurance Society, which is a subsidiary of the Rockefeller interests. He is chosen from California to prosecute the Government's claim on sections 16 and 36.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, he will find good and agreeable company here with the present crowd and with that training.

Mr. President, another piece of camouflage in politics that the President is playing, which the country perhaps has not analyzed, was his recommendation in a message the other day that Congress reduce taxes for the current year 25 per cent. Anyone who studies the proposition knows that for the President to request that about four days before the time expired when practically all the returns had been made, was asking an impossibility. The leader of the Republican side in the other House and the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee in the other House both stated that it was impossible in so short a time to perform the service. But the President plays to the country as the friend of the taxpayers, and in his message he says nothing about the provision that has passed the House which will give to the people throughout the country this 25 per cent tax reduction. There is no question but that the American people will get their reduction in the 1923 taxes. It is written in the bill, and it has been pointed out here already, that as the bill passed the House it was obnoxious to the Secretary of the Treasury. He had pleaded that the surtax be reduced on the higher incomes to 25 per cent. He stated that 37½ per cent did not cure the defects he pointed out, and what they are trying to do is to pass a joint resolution here only giving a reduction of 25 per cent to the taxpayers in their taxes for 1923.

Then they say, "No; you leaders need not pass the regular tax bill. Let us go to the people this year and tell them that we have already given them the 25 per cent reduction for 1923. Let us tell them to put us back into power with a bigger majority, drive out some of these radicals, and defeat some of the Democrats, and we will give them more reduction in the coming year."

You are trying to fix up a plan so that the President can veto a permanent tax bill which will give some relief, in equity and justice to the American taxpayers. You know, with the 25 per cent reduction for 1923 incorporated in the bill he dares to veto it.

I hold in my hand a joint resolution introduced in the House of Representatives on January 31, 1924, nearly six weeks before the President delivered his message to Congress. That joint resolution was introduced in the House by Mr. GARNER, the ranking Democrat upon the Ways and Means Committee, and at that time he pleaded, not only through the terms of this resolution but otherwise, for the Congress to pass it at that time giving this reduction, so that the Senate would have time to consider it, and the American taxpayer could get the relief. But what did the Republican leadership in the House do? They turned it down. They did not pass it. But the President waited until four days before March 15, when he urged Congress in a message to pass the resolution by unanimous consent. It was pure politics—nothing more, nothing less.

They will get the relief whether the bill passed by the House, now being considered in the Senate committee, becomes a law or not. They will get relief on their taxes for 1923, but after consideration. The President can not camouflage. He can not play politics with that proposition, even though he has played politics in indorsing the Norbeck bill, which was repudiated by the Senate, in order to win the Republican votes in the wheat area, and in appointing the friend of my friend the Senator from California to the office of Secretary of the Navy after tendering the appointment to Judge Kenyon.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE rose.

Mr. HARRISON. I do not blame the Senator for smiling.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, that is a most excellent appointment.

Mr. HARRISON. I knew the Senator would say that, but I doubt whether his colleague, the opponent of the President, will say it.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. He will join with me.

FREEDOM OF SPEECH IN THE SENATE.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that on next Monday, at the conclusion of the routine morning business, I be permitted to address the Senate on the subject "A recent assault upon the freedom of speech in the Senate."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Chair understand that the Senator asks unanimous consent to be permitted to address the Senate on next Monday?

Mr. NEELY. Yes, Mr. President, at the conclusion of the routine morning business on next Monday. In conformity with the custom prevailing here, it would only be necessary for me "to give notice" of my intention to speak in order to obtain the privilege of delivering my address. But inasmuch as there is no authority either of rule or law for such notice, I prefer to request unanimous consent, which, if granted, will certainly afford me the opportunity I desire.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I do not want to object, but I wish the Senator would make it some other day. Monday is calendar day. We are away behind with the calendar.

Mr. NEELY. I shall be accommodating and accordingly make my request for time at the conclusion of the routine morning business on next Tuesday instead of Monday.

Mr. CURTIS. I will not object to that.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. What is the request of the Senator?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from West Virginia asks unanimous consent that he be permitted to address the Senate on a certain subject on Tuesday next at the conclusion of the routine morning business. The Chair assumes that the then occupant of the chair will recognize the Senator from West Virginia in the usual way. Is there objection to such an understanding being had?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, if I understand the effect of what the Senator from West Virginia is doing, he is giving notice that upon that occasion he will address the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator says there is no provision in the rules for giving such a notice, and hence he is making a direct request for unanimous consent.

Mr. NEELY. If the distinguished Senator from Idaho will cite any authority by virtue of which a Senator can obtain the privilege of addressing the Senate at a particular time by simply giving a notice to that effect, he will thereby render real service to all who are interested in establishing or preserving orderly procedure in the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from West Virginia? The Chair hears no objection.

RETURN OF EDWIN S. DENBY TO DETROIT.

Mr. STANFIELD. Mr. President, an article appeared in this morning's Washington Post purporting to give an account of the home-coming of the ex-Secretary of the Navy, Edwin S. Denby, and inasmuch as so much has appeared in the RECORD regarding the Secretary, and inasmuch as this gives his home-coming speech, when he went back and addressed the people of Detroit, I ask unanimous consent that the article may be printed in the RECORD, without reading.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

DENBY, IN DETROIT, SAYS HE RETURNS TO HOME PROUDLY—BACK FROM HIS THIRD WAR, FORMER SECRETARY TELLS WELCOMING CROWD—DEFENDS OIL POLICIES AS AID TO DEFENSES—REJOICES IN BELIEF THAT WORK HE ATTEMPTED WILL GIVE FLEET A FUEL SUPPLY.

DETROIT, March 13.—"Ned" Denby, one-time gunner's mate on the U. S. S. Yosemite, State legislator, Representative in Congress, three years Secretary of the Navy, a veteran of two wars, and now a major in the Marine Corps Reserve—"Ned" Denby came home to-day.

Thousands swarmed the concourse at the Michigan Central Station as the former Cabinet officer arrived from Washington, and the route to the city hall, where the Denby party was welcomed by Acting Mayor Joseph A. Martin, was lined with people. An afternoon of receptions culminated in a banquet in his honor, at which representatives of virtually every walk of life and of all political parties were present.

Mr. Denby read his prepared address.

Resignation from the Cabinet "while still the malicious shafts of shame and ridicule were hurtling round my head" was the "hardest and, I think, the bravest thing I have ever done," he said.

"I come neither asking forgiveness nor bowed down in shame," the former Secretary said, "but proudly to proclaim to you that I have done no wrong nor aught that merits rebuke from you, by dearest friends, nor from them, my ruthless enemies. Rather let me say to you that I have endeavored to do my duty as fully as God has given me power to do.

"So you shall not find me wearing my grievances, if I have any, upon my sleeve. You shall not be asked for sympathy, and I pray you do not give it, for I do not need it. You shall not be bored now or hereafter, collectively or individually, with the recital of my woes, for I have none."

DUTY TO GUARD DEFENSES.

A duty that rests upon the Secretary of the Navy, Mr. Denby said, is to see that provision is made that the outer walls of defense, "the walls of steel against attack at any time, from any quarter," may hold.

"That needs thinking ahead, and providing for the needs of the fleet," he continued. "In trying to do that I have been overthrown.

"But I rejoice in the belief that the work is done. Fuel oil will be found in Hawaii for the onrushing fleet if it ever is needed. And along the coasts, east and west, of our country great reservoirs will be found when and if the need ever comes. They will be created by exchange or sale or storage of the underground deposit, which, had it not been brought to the surface, would have been lost to the Navy forever.

"I believe that what I did was just and lawful and sound, and for the best interests of the United States. It would be idle to answer those who say that I, who have loved my country and served it twice in military uniform, that I, who cherish for the great service of which I had the honor for three years to be the chief, the warmest affection and pride, that I, who look into your faces to-night and find there confidence, affection, and esteem, could have betrayed my country, the Navy, and you."

Mr. Denby said that twice before he had come home to Michigan from war to find friendship, confidence, and kindness.

"Now, for the third time," he continued, "I come from war made hateful by poisoned gas and base strategems, from defeat without shame, to welcome without flaw. By innuendo and even direct attack, for the first time in my life my integrity has been assailed, vainly assailed, I make bold to believe, in the ears of those who hear me now.

"But do you think I could have lived, bathed in filth from day to day, if I had not known there was no joint in the armor of my honor? We talk about good conscience, but we do not understand until the enemy is trying to crush heart and soul. Then between us and shame and despair good conscience and simple faith stand like guardian angels. These angels and a third stood ever keeping open the door of happiness and keeping out the demons of hate and bitterness. The third was my wife.

"When your wife can read day after day columns of abuse and denunciation and keep always a smile and never complain and never regret loss of honors, place, and position, so long as honor is unimpaired, the world has no weapon to break or embitter the soul. And from her, too, there will be no mourning nor complaining of an unjust world."

PENSIONS AND INCREASE OF PENSIONS.

Mr. BURSUM. Mr. President, I give notice that as soon as the Norris resolution is disposed of under the unanimous-consent agreement I shall move to take up Senate bill 5, a general pension bill, that it may become the unfinished business.

MEDICINE BOW NATIONAL FOREST, WYO.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 699) authorizing the addition of certain lands to the Medicine Bow National Forest, Wyo., and for other purposes.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MISSOURI RIVER BRIDGE, SOUTH DAKOTA.

The bill (S. 2420) granting the consent of Congress to the State of South Dakota for the construction of a bridge across the Missouri River between Potter County and Dewey County, S. Dak., was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the consent of Congress is hereby granted to the State of South Dakota to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the Missouri River, at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, between Potter County and Dewey County, S. Dak., in accordance with the provisions of an act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PEARL RIVER BRIDGES, MISSISSIPPI.

The bill (S. 1370) authorizing the granting of war-risk insurance to Capt. Earl L. Naiden, Air Service, United States Army, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Finance with amendments, on page 1, line 3, after the word "the," to strike out the words "War Risk Insurance Division" and insert the word "Director"; on line 6, before the word "Air," to insert the words "now on active duty"; and on page 2, after line 5, to insert the following provision: "Provided, That application for such insurance be made within 60 days after the approval of this act: And provided further, That this act shall have no retroactive effect and shall confer no rights to insurance against injuries or disability heretofore suffered by Captain Naiden," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Director of the United States Veterans' Bureau be, and hereby is, authorized and directed to accept the application for war-risk insurance of Capt. Earl L. Risk Insurance in the Treasury Department,' approved September 2, 1914, and for other purposes," approved October 6, 1917: Provided, That application for such insurance be made within 60 days after the approval of this act: And provided further, That this act shall have no retroactive effect and shall confer no right to insurance against injuries or disability heretofore suffered by Captain Naiden.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, let the bill be read as proposed to be amended. I do not think we understand just what it is.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the bill as reported.

The reading clerk read the bill as proposed to be amended by the Committee on Finance.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendments of the committee.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ALASKA STEAMSHIP CO.

The bill (S. 732) for the relief of the Alaska Steamship Co. was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let the bill go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

CHANGE OF DATE OF INAUGURATION.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 22) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States fixing the commencement of the terms of President and Vice President and Members of Congress and fixing the time of the assembling of Congress was announced as next in order.

Mr. McKELLAR. That comes up at 2 o'clock under the agreement.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. By unanimous consent the joint resolution will be brought before the Senate at 2 o'clock to-day. It will be passed over until that hour.

LINCOLN'S BIRTHDAY.

The bill (S. 1641) to declare Lincoln's birthday a legal holiday was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the 12th day of February in each year, being the anniversary of the birth of Abraham Lincoln, is hereby made a legal holiday within the District of Columbia, to be known as Lincoln Day, and in its observance and effect it shall be subject to all the provisions of law applicable to holidays within said District.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I inquire of the Senator from Delaware how many legal holidays we have in the District now?

Mr. BALL. I am not sure of the number. I know that Lincoln's birthday is a legal holiday in almost every State, but it is not a legal holiday in the National Capital, where, by all means, it should be.

Mr. KING. I agree with the Senator that if we have a holiday on the birthday of any public character in addition to Washington's it ought to be Lincoln's; but I doubt very much the wisdom of creating numerous holidays. If the Senator can extinguish one of the other names and place Lincoln's name in lieu of it, I think he would be doing a very great service, but not by increasing the number of holidays. Does the Senator know the number of legal holidays in the District now?

Mr. BALL. Washington's birthday is a legal holiday, and so are the Fourth of July and Christmas.

Mr. KING. There are many more than that.

Mr. WILLIS. Memorial Day is a legal holiday.

Mr. BALL. Those are the only holidays in the District of Columbia. It seems to me, since practically all of the States have made Lincoln's birthday a legal holiday, that certainly the National Capital should do so.

Mr. KING. I have no objection to the passage of the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CHARLES H. WILLEY.

The bill (S. 264) for the relief of Charles H. Willey was considered in Committee of the Whole, and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That Charles H. Willey, a warrant machinist of the United States Navy, shall be held and considered to have completed nine years' active naval service and to have been transferred to the retired list of officers of the Navy from the 18th day of August, 1917, and the Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized and directed to grant said officer the retired pay and allowances of his rank and length of service in accordance herewith: Provided, That no back pay or allowances shall accrue by reason of the passage of this act.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

GORDON G. MACDONALD.

The bill (S. 1013) for the relief of Gordon G. MacDonald was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let the bill go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

ACCOUNTS BETWEEN THE UNITED STATES AND THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The bill (S. 703) making an adjustment of certain accounts between the United States and the District of Columbia was announced as next in order.

Mr. McKELLAR. Let the bill go over.

Mr. PHIPPS. An objection has been made to the present consideration of the bill?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection was made by the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. McKELLAR. There is a large sum involved and I would like to look into it. Let it go over for another week and I will look into it.

Mr. BALL. What is the bill?

Mr. PHIPPS. It is the bill applying to the fiscal relations between the District of Columbia and the Federal Government. Of course, I want to have the Senator from Tennessee and everyone else given a full opportunity to examine it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

EXTENSION OF DISTRICT PARK SYSTEM.

The bill (S. 1787) authorizing the extension of the park system of the District of Columbia was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. I would like to ask the Senator from Delaware, the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia, whether the section of land which it is sought to acquire was not covered by a bill which received the attention of the Senate at the last session and which we refused to buy?

Mr. PHIPPS. May I answer the Senator's question? I will say that the items comprised in the bill, as I understand them—Piney Branch, the Patterson tract, and Klingle Valley tract—have heretofore been carried in the District of Columbia appropriation bill under items put in the bill by the Senate Committee on Appropriations. They have been approved by the Senate, but have gone to the House and the House has not accepted them. I believe the House has had a special committee investigating the matter very recently and that committee has made a favorable report, and the committee of the House having the matter in charge has favorably reported a bill similar to this to the House of Representatives.

Mr. KING. Let me inquire of the Senator if we did not have considerable discussion at the last session of Congress with reference to what is called the Patterson tract, and if the claim was not made that there was no necessity for the Government to acquire that particular tract, that it had land of its own contiguous to it which it could use to far greater advantage for park purposes than the particular Patterson tract?

Mr. PHIPPS. That is true. The Senator's recollection is quite correct. However, it was believed on the part of other Senators who inquired into the matter that the Government-owned property being used by one of the institutions—the Deaf and Dumb School—is not adequate or sufficient in area for the necessary park purposes in the eastern section of the city, where we really have no public parks available for sports and other activities. Unless this property is acquired at the present time, it will undoubtedly be diverted to other uses and be no longer available for park purposes.

Mr. KING. I have been such an advocate of parks in the District and have so lamented that the District officials have not taken greater care of the parks and made more extensive and comprehensive plans for a park system that I dislike to object to the present consideration of the bill. However, my recollection is that considerable opposition was evinced to a similar bill at the last session of Congress and there was a very strong representation made that this land is not needed by the city, that it would be doing very serious injury to individuals, and that there would be no corresponding advantage to the public.

Mr. PHIPPS. The opinion of the Senate is shown by the favorable vote on the bill providing that the property should be acquired, and the Senate is on record on at least two different occasions to that effect. In the meantime a portion of the property, that which was best adapted for commercial uses, has been disposed of, so that the area now to be acquired is considerably less in extent than was originally contemplated and comprised within the action taken by the Senate.

Mr. KING. I shall be very glad to hear an explanation from the chairman of the committee, who has no doubt given the matter attention.

Mr. BALL. The point in dispute before was a certain part of the Patterson tract which was not really needed apparently for park purposes, but was very valuable for commercial purposes. The owners of the tract objected to its being taken for park purposes. The present plan has eliminated that part entirely and is taking only the part of the Patterson tract which is valuable for park purposes.

It is very necessary that the bill be passed to-day; otherwise there will be a complete break in the park system owing to the Klingle Valley tract situation. The contractors have commenced work in the filling there, and are working to-day, I understand. If we pass the bill and show a disposition to acquire that tract for park purposes I understand they will cease operations. Therefore I hope the Senator from Utah will not object to the present consideration of the bill.

Mr. KING. In view of the statement made by the Senators I shall not object to the present consideration of the bill, and particularly do I not object for the reason I expressed a moment ago. I feel that we have been derelict in the District in providing as comprehensive a system of parks as should have been provided for the Capital of the Nation. I hope the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia will challenge the attention of the city authorities to the fact that in the suburbs which are being added and in additions being brought under the jurisdiction of the city provision should be made for a proper parking system. We are tying them up to the city without properly integrating them with reference to the harmony of the development of the city, and we are going to have a patchwork city after a while which will not be the Capital that it should be, artistically beautiful and satisfactory to the American people.

Mr. BALL. That is the reason why it is so important to pass the bill to-day. Otherwise the connection between the outlying park system will be broken. If we pass the bill to-day and can get the contractors to cease operations, showing that the tract is going to be acquired for park purposes, there will be no break in the plan of completing all that great parking system around Washington.

Mr. KING. May I inquire approximately the cost of lands to be acquired under the bill?

Mr. PHIPPS. It is given in the bill. I want to make a personal statement. The Klingle Valley tract is in close proximity to my residence in Washington, and therefore I do not care to express any opinion on the Klingle Valley tract. I am strongly in favor of the other two, and particularly the Patterson tract.

Mr. KING. Would the Senator object if I should move to strike out the Klingle tract?

Mr. PHIPPS. I could not object, but I have great confidence that the Senator is not going to make that motion.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator from Utah asked the amount involved. The Klingle Road Valley Park is to cost not to exceed $200,000, the Piney Branch Valley Park, east of Sixteenth Street, $155,000; the Piney Branch Valley Park, west of Sixteenth Street, $107,000; and the Patterson tract, $300,000. Those are the amounts.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia are hereby authorized to acquire, by purchase so far as they may be able to purchase at prices deemed by them to be reasonable and fair, otherwise by condemnation proceedings under and in accordance with the act approved August 30, 1890, section 3 (U. S. Stat. L., vol. 26, pp. 412 and 413), the following tracts of land for park purposes, to wit: The tract known as the Klingle Road Valley Park, as shown on park map No. 1002 in the office of the surveyor of the District of Columbia, containing about 18½ acres; the Piney Branch Valley Park east of Sixteenth Street as shown on park map No. 291 in the office of the surveyor of the District of Columbia, containing about 11 acres; areas for widening the Piney Branch Valley Park west of Sixteenth Street to preserve the forests to the top of the hillsides, as shown on map No. 291–A in the office of the surveyor of the District of Columbia, containing about 19 acres; and a portion of the Patterson tract known as parcel 129–2 as shown on park map No. 647–C in the office of the surveyor of the District of Columbia, containing about 59.16 acres; said commissioners are further authorized to reduce the area to be acquired in any of said tracts when, by reason of improvements constructed or unreasonable prices asked or for other reasons, in their judgment, the public interest may require: Provided, That if acquired by purchase the cost of the respective tracts shall not exceed the following sums: The Klingle Road Valley Park, $200,000; the Piney Branch Valley Park, $155,000; areas for widening the Piney Branch Valley Park west of Sixteenth Street, $107,000; the portion of the Patterson tract as described, $300,000: Provided further, That the tracts herein authorized to be acquired shall become part of the park system of the District of Columbia and be under control of the Chief of Engineers of the United States Army, and the cost of the acquisition and the improvement and maintenance of said tracts as public parks shall be paid out of the revenues of the District of Columbia and the general funds of the Treasury in the same proportion as other expenses of the government of the District of Columbia.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. McKINLEY. Let the resolution go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be passed over.

The bill (S. 1499) to promote the safety of passengers and employees upon railroads by prohibiting the use of wooden cars under certain circumstances was announced as next in order.

Mr. HARRIS. Let the bill go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 185) to promote agriculture by stabilizing the price of wheat was announced as next in order.

Mr. OVERMAN. Let the bill go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 2401) providing for the compensation of retired warrant officers and enlisted men of the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps, or any other service or department created by or under the jurisdiction of the United States Government, and warrant officers and enlisted men of the Reserve Corps of the Army and Navy was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

W. ERNEST JARVIS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 131) for the relief of W. Ernest Jarvis. It proposes to pay to W. Ernest Jarvis $97.50, 60 per cent thereof to be paid out of the revenues of the District of Columbia and 40 per cent out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, being the claim of said W. Ernest Jarvis covering undertaker's services for and burial expenses of Willie L. Byers, late an inmate of the National Training School for Girls, in the District of Columbia.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOHN T. EATON.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 335) for the relief of John T. Eaton. It proposes to pay to John T. Eaton, of Helena, Mont., $560, in compliance with the findings of the Court of Claims, Senate Document No. 220 of the first session of the Sixty-third Congress.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JANIE BEASLEY GLISSON.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 648) for the relief of Janie Beasley Glisson. It proposes to pay to Janie Beasley Glisson $5,000, for damages suffered by her when she was struck and permanently injured by a Government airplane which was in charge of and driven by officers of the United States Army.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DAVID C. VAN VOORHIS.

The bill (S. 2168) for the relief of David C. Van Voorhis was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that bill go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, I should like to have the Senator from Utah withdraw his objection to the consideration of the bill, unless he has fully decided that it should go over. A bill similar to this passed the Senate at the last session of Congress without opposition when former Senator from Ohio, Mr. Pomerene, was a member of the Senate.

Mr. KING. If the Senator from Ohio will let the bill go over until the next calendar day, I shall be glad in the meantime to examine into it.

Mr. FESS. Very well.

ESTATE OF ALPHONSE DESMARE, DECEASED.

The bill (S. 2219) for the relief of the legal representatives of the estate of Alphonse Desmare, deceased, and others, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. I should like an explanation of the bill from the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL] before I consent to its passage.

Mr. RANSDELL. I shall be very glad to give a brief explanation of the bill. The bill proposes to authorize the claimants to submit their claims to the Court of Claims for adjudication. The claims are for some cotton which was bought during the Civil War and the proceeds of which passed into the Federal Treasury. The money is now lying in the Treasury. I can better explain the matter to the Senate by reading merely a few lines from the report of the committee, which is a unanimous report. The report states:

In this case the return of the trust funds by the trustee, who holds and claims nothing but a naked title, is not prevented by disloyalty or fraud, but by the mere incident of domicile.

There was no loyalty, no fraud, or anything of that kind in this case. The committee then go on to state:

Your committee can see no sound reason in law, equity, or good morals why a geographical residence, north or south, should at this time work a forfeiture to, or confiscation by, the Government of any property, especially of property which was acquired as this was, and to which the United States does not claim any title but holds it in trust for the lawful and loyal owner. (See act of March 12, 1863.)

The nonintercourse laws grew out of the necessities and perils which beset the Government during the War of the Rebellion. These necessities and dangers are now long since happily passed and it seems only just and proper that a less stringent application of these laws should be made and restitution of the property made—property to which the United States has no real title.

The purpose of the bill is to confer jurisdiction on the Court of Claims to hear, adjudicate, and determine the claim of the legal representatives of the estate of Alphonse Desmare, deceased, and your committee is of the opinion that the claimants are entitled to a hearing and threfore recommend the passage of the bill.

Mr. KING. How much money is involved in the bill?

Mr. RANSDELL. I can not tell the Senator exactly how much is involved, for the record does not show; but the claims are for some cotton which was captured by the Federal authorities. The cotton was sold and the money passed into the Treasury and is supposed to be now lying in the Treasury. The committee report concludes:

The following claims are identical to Desmare's claim, all of which have been paid:

Warren Mitchell (33 Stat. 776); Robert E. Montgomery (38 Stat. 971); James A. Briggs (28 Stat. 568); Rebecca Forch, admx. (49 C. Cls. 709).

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 2219) for the relief of the legal representatives of the estate of Alphonse Desmare, deceased, and others, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the claim of the legal representatives of the estate of Alphonse Desmare, deceased, and the claim of the legal representative of the estate of Cyprian Dupre, deceased, surviving partner of the late firm of Desmare & Dupre, for the net proceeds of the cotton purchased or owned by them, taken by the United States officers, sold, and the net proceeds thereof placed in the United States Treasury, be, and the same is hereby, referred to the Court of Claims for determination of the law, and the facts, under the act of Congress approved March 12, 1863 (12 Stat. L., p. 820), any statute of limitations, or the act of July 2, 1864 (13 Stat. L. p. 376), and all other nonintercourse laws to the contrary notwithstanding, and report to Congress.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LOUISE ST. GEZ.

The bill (S. 2220) for the relief of Louise St. Gez, executrix of August Ferré, deceased, surviving partner of Lapene & Ferré, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. I should like an explanation of that bill, Mr. President.

Mr. RANSDELL. This bill involves the same character of claims as were involved in the bill which has just passed, I will say to the Senator. The Senate has passed a similar bill twice heretofore. It is a bill proposing to give the Court of Claims jurisdiction to adjudicate a claim for cotton. In this particular case the claim was once referred to the Court of Claims and the Court of Claims rendered judgment in favor of the claimant for $34,368, the amount of the net proceeds from the sales of the cotton, which were found to have gone into the Treasury, all of which appears by the report on the case in the Sixth Court of Claims Reports at page 363. An appeal was then taken by the Government to the Supreme Court, and on the ground of domicile—not equity, not disloyalty, nothing of that kind, but purely on a technical ground of domicile—the Supreme Court overruled the decision of the Court of Claims. All of this will be found in the report of the committee which has been filed with the bill.

This identical claim has been twice passed upon favorably by the Senate, the first time in 1906 and again in 1908. The committee reports the bill favorably and recites a number of cases where relief was granted in the case of claims which were identical with this one.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill; which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the claim of Louise St. Gez, executrix of Auguste Ferré, deceased, surviving partner of the late firm of Lapene & Ferré, for the net proceeds of the cotton purchased or owned by them, taken by United States officers, sold, and the net proceeds thereof placed in the United States Treasury, be, and the same is hereby, referred to the Court of Claims, for determination of the law and the facts, under the act of Congress approved March 12, 1863 (12 Stat. L. 820) any statute of limitations, or the act of July 2, 1864 (13 Stats., 376), and all other nonintercourse laws to the contrary notwithstanding, and report to Congress.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I merely wish to say to the Senate that if all the bills similar to the one now pending shall become laws, and the claims therein involved shall be paid, I think about $400,000,000, or, at least, something like that amount, will be involved.

Mr. OVERMAN. The amount will only be $4,000,000.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from North Carolina states it would be $4,000,000. The Committee on Claims of the Senate in years past have never reported favorably on such bills.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, I do not know the number of claims which are pending, but whether that be true or not, if this Government of ours received the property of loyal citizens and has the money now lying in its vaults, those citizens certainly ought to be permitted to make out their claim against the Government, to have determined the question of the amount due them, and then it will be up to Congress thereafter to provide the payment. They certainly ought to have a chance to have such cases referred to the Court of Claims, and that is all this bill provides.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator whether this will wind up the bobbin, to use the language of the street?

Mr. RANSDELL. I can not tell the Senator that; it would take a man who is a prophet and even more than a prophet to tell whether there are any similar claims anywhere in the United States. I know of no others in my State, but there may be, I will say to the Senator, for I want to be absolutely frank with him. However, I do not know of any of them.

Mr. SMOOT. I know of a great many of them, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. RANSDELL. We ought not to deprive people of their rights even if there are a good many claims.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WILLIAM HENSLEY.

The bill (S. 2562) for the relief of William Hensley was announced as next in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. KING. I should like to inquire why this employee of the Government, if he is an employee of the Government, does not avail himself of the provisions of the workmen's compensation act?

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, he has received the benefits of the compensation act for the period of one year—which is as long as he can have the benefits of that act—to the extent of $2.40 per day. The man is blind; he lost three fingers, and is unable to make a livelihood. We have had a report from a physician within the last few months stating that he is still incapacitated to make a living, and yet he has received only a few hundred dollars on account of the injuries he received.

The claim originally was for $10,000, and the committee thought that this allowance of $1,500 was a very meager allowance, and that he was fully entitled to it.

Mr. KING. May I inquire of the Senator—and I ask the question for information—if the workmen's compensation act is not a continuing act, and if a person who comes within its provisions does not receive compensation for life?

Mr. CAPPER. It is limited to one year; and, then, if the injuries continue and he is unable to make his living, he can have the benefits of the act for six months further. The claimant in this case has had the benefits of the act for one year and six months, which have amounted all told to less than $1,000, and yet for years he has been practically incapacitated for making a livelihood. It is really a very distressing case, I think.

Mr. KING. The workmen's compensation act is not limited, as I understand, as indicated by the Senator. The facts probably are, I presume, that this man was injured before the workmen's compensation act went into effect.

Mr. CAPPER. I will read from a letter of the Secretary of the Navy, in which he says:

> As the result of this injury, Mr. Hensley, since its incurrence, has been incapacitated for labor, and has received, under the workmen's compensation act of May 30, 1908 (35 Stat. 556), compensation at the rate of $2.40 per diem. His claim for compensation under the act cited has been approved by the Secretary of Labor for a period expiring not later than April 21, 1914; but in case of the continuance of his incapacity, compensation may be allowed for a further period of six months. The medical officer of the navy yard expresses the opinion that Mr. Hensley will soon be able to do light duty in the gun shop.

That letter was written on March 16, 1914; but, as a matter of fact, Mr. Hensley has never been able to perform any duty, and is still a charge upon his friends and the public, and he has received all that he can receive under the compensation act.

Mr. KING. There is no question but what his injuries were received while in the employ of the Government?

Mr. CAPPER. Not at all.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. KING. I have no objection.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to pay to William Hensley $1,500, in full payment for injuries sustained by him while in the discharge of his duties at the navy yard, Washington, resulting in the loss of three fingers of his right hand, loss of his left eye, and other injuries incurred by him in the line of duty.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HYDROELECTRIC DEVELOPMENT AT GREAT FALLS.

The bill (S. 746) providing for the development of hydroelectric energy at Great Falls was announced as next in order.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I object to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I presume——

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I hope the Senator will withhold the objection for a moment. Bills similar to the bill now on the calendar providing for the development of power at Great Falls have been passed on several occasions by the Senate heretofore. If it were not for that fact, I would not, of course, expect to pass a bill of this importance on the call of the calendar. I wish, however, to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that similar bills have heretofore passed the Senate three times, not in the identical form in which this bill is, because on one occasion when the bill passed the Senate and went to conference the conferees reported a compromise which provided for a resurvey by the War Department. A resurvey was made, and the report of Major Tyler was the result. So the next time I introduced the bill I took the latest survey as a basis, and that bill also passed the Senate providing for the same development as provided for in this bill.

Mr. KING. I do not want the Senator to think that I shall object to the consideration of this bill, but I know of a number of Senators who expect to say something upon the measure and did not anticipate that it would be called up this morning. So I thought that under the five-minute rule and during the morning hour it was quite likely the matter could not be disposed of. I should be glad if the Senator will endeavor to make it the unfinished business at some early date so that the matter may be fully canvassed and action taken by the Senate.

Mr. NORRIS. I know that it would be asking a good deal to request to take up a bill of this importance under present conditions, and I would not expect to do it under any consideration if similar bills had not passed the Senate heretofore. On a former occasion a bill of the same character was passed after very full discussion and debate upon a roll call. I realize that we ought to give more attention, perhaps, under all the circumstances to a bill of this kind, and I am not complaining of the Senator because he objects; but it is a difficult thing, Mr. President, to pick out these bills and take them up by motion because of other business before the Senate. I wish to say, however, while this bill is before the Senate, if the objection is still insisted on, that I should like to arrange by unanimous consent, if possible, for the consideration of this bill and its disposition. I do not think it will take more than an hour or so of debate because, in my judgment, the Senate is practically unanimous in favor of the development of the water power at Great Falls.

Mr. KING. I shall join with the Senator from Nebraska in asking that this bill may be taken up to-morrow, or at the beginning of next week, or on any other day the Senator may indicate.

Mr. NORRIS. Suppose we have this understanding, then——

Mr. KING. I suggest taking it up on Calendar Monday and giving it the right of way. I shall be glad to join in that.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not know how long the constitutional amendment that will come up at 2 o'clock is going to take. It has passed the Senate before, too, and it may not take very long. Perhaps the Senator from Utah can give me somewhat of an idea on that subject. I understand that the Senator from Missouri is not in the Chamber at the present time. If that does not take up much time, I should like to take up the Great Falls matter following that, or within a few days, anyway.

Mr. FLETCHER. I was going to suggest that we might, by unanimous consent, take it up immediately following the consideration of the constitutional amendment.

Mr. KING. We should have to call the roll, then.

Mr. NORRIS. I will content myself at the present time with saying that within the next week or so I am going to make an attempt to bring up this bill, and I shall be glad to have the assistance of the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. I will join with the Senator in endeavoring to take it up next week.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair was about to suggest to the Senator that he make a motion to take it up when the other matter is disposed of.

Mr. NORRIS. If we get through with that early, I may be able to do it then.

BILL PASSED OVER.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the next bill on the calendar.

The bill (S. 709) for the relief of the Commercial Pacific Cable Co. was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. I should like some explanation of that matter before I assent to its consideration.

Mr. OVERMAN. Why not let it go over?

Mr. KING. Let it go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

GOVERNMENT LEVEE AT YUMA, ARIZ.

The bill (S. 514) authorizing the Secretary of War to grant a right of way over the Government levee at Yuma, Ariz., was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment, on page 1, line 6, after the word "railroad," to insert the word "and," so as to make the bill read:

> Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to grant to the Southern Pacific Railroad Co., a corporation of the States of California, Arizona, and New Mexico, its successors and assigns, a permanent right of way for railroad and telegraph purposes over and across the levee built by the United States on the Gila River near its junction with the Colorado River at Yuma, Ariz., including the right to construct and maintain embankments and other works thereon: Provided, That the grant shall be subject to such stipulations as, in the judgment of the Secretary of War, will insure the maintenance of said levee without further cost to the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I am not going to object to the consideration of this bill, but I should like to know whether any interference is possible with any reclamation project in which the Government is interested?

Mr. WARREN. No, Mr. President; that matter was carefully considered in the committee, and I wish to say that it is protected rather than otherwise.

Mr. KING. I have no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The bill was passed.

BILLS PASSED OVER.

The bill (S. 964) for the relief of William J. Ewing was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I am going to object to some of these bills where it is apparent that the beneficiaries are employees of the Government and do not come within the Federal compensation act, which makes provision for cases of this kind. Special bills ought not to be passed where we have a Federal act that will do justice to all employees of the Government.

Mr. CAPPER. I ask that the bill be passed over temporarily. The Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCNARY], who introduced the bill, is not present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over temporarily at the request of the Senator from Kansas.

The bill (S. 2357) for the relief of the Pacific Commissary Co. was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

MONUMENT TO COMMEMORATE SACRIFICES OF AMERICAN WOMEN IN WORLD WAR.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 43) in relation to a monument to commemorate the services and sacrifices of the women of the United States of America, its insular possessions, and the District of Columbia in the World War was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The joint resolution had been reported from the Committee on the Library, with amendments, on page 1, line 3, after the word "hereby," to insert "authorized to be"; on page 2, line 8, after the word "hereby," to insert "authorized to be"; and on page 2, line 11, after the word "hereby," to insert "authorized to be," so as to make the joint resolution read:

Resolved, etc., That there is hereby authorized to be appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated the sum of $150,000 as a part contribution to the erection of a memorial building with equipment in the District of Columbia to commemorate services and sacrifices of the patriotic women of the United States of America, of its insular possessions, and of the District of Columbia during the World War, said memorial to be erected on the land now occupied in part by the Memorial to the Women of the Civil War, the permanent headquarters of the American Red Cross.

SEC. 2. That said memorial shall be a building monumental in design and character and shall be used by the American National Red Cross and shall cost not less than $300,000: Provided, That this expenditure shall include complete equipment.

SEC. 3. That the sum hereby authorized to be appropriated shall not be payable until there shall be raised by private subscription an additional sum of $150,000.

SEC. 4. That the money hereby authorized to be appropriated shall not be paid until the plan of the proposed building shall have been approved by a commission consisting of the president of the American Red Cross, the Secretary of War, the chairman of the Senate Committee on the Library, the chairman of the House Committee on the Library, and a representative of the central committee of the American Red Cross. The plans of the said memorial shall likewise be approved by the Commission of Fine Arts.

The expenditures for said memorial building shall be made under the direction of a commission consisting of the chairman of the Senate Committee on the Library and the chairman of the House Committee on the Library. That said memorial building shall remain the property of the United States Government but under the supervision of the Superintendent of Public Buildings and Grounds, and the American Red Cross shall at all times be charged with the responsibility, the care, keeping, and maintenance of the said memorial building without expense to the United States.

The amendments were agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILL PASSED OVER.

The bill (S. 2012) declaring an emergency in respect of certain agricultural commodities, to promote equality between agricultural commodities and other commodities, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

J. B. PLATT.

The bill (S. 1180) for the relief of J. B. Platt was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to J. B. Platt, of New Castle, Del., out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $170.37, said sum being due J. B. Platt for merchandise furnished to the Reedy Island Naval Station mess during the months of September and October, 1917, and the months of October, November, and December, 1918.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILL PASSED OVER.

The bill (S. 1974) providing for sundry matters affecting the Military Establishment was announced as next in order.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, that is a long bill. I do not believe there is much opposition to it. There are some amendments, however, and I doubt if it can be disposed of under the five-minute rule.

Mr. OVERMAN. Let it go over.

Mr. WARREN. It is a very important measure, but, as the Senator says, it will very likely lead to some discussion.

Mr. MCKELLAR. I think so.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

SAMUEL S. ARCHER.

The bill (S. 1643) for the relief of Samuel S. Archer was announced as next in order.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, I do not think the Senate of the United States is competent to sit as a jury and award damages in personal-injury cases, especially without some explanation by Senators who have introduced or examined these bills.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will suggest that this is the bill of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] and was reported by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. BROOKHART].

Mr. MCKELLAR. There is a quite full explanation of it in the report.

Mr. BROOKHART. Yes. The bill provides for the payment of a judgment of the Court of Claims for $226. It is the only claim I found where the amount was less than the man was entitled to. I think there is no doubt that the bill should pass.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any funds in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $226 to Samuel S. Archer, for injuries sustained as the result of being struck by a Government-owned automobile on the streets of the city of Plattsmouth, Nebr., on December 13, 1921.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILL PASSED OVER.

The bill (S. 2122) to create a Pribilof Islands fund and to provide for the disposition of surplus revenue from the Pribilof Islands, Alaska, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JONES of Washington in the chair). The Chair thinks that bill will have to go over.

Mr. MCKELLAR. I think it should go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

WILLIAM HENRY BOYCE, SR.

The bill (S. 2510) for the relief of William Henry Boyce, sr., was considered as in Committee of the Whole and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to redeem, in favor of William Henry Boyce, sr., of Ansonville, N. C., 4½ per cent United States Treasury certificates of indebtedness, Nos. 7378 and 7379, in the denomination of $1,000 each, and No. 3371, in the denomination of $500, series TM–1924, issued March 15, 1923, matured March 15, 1924, with interest at the rate of 4½ per cent per annum from March 15, 1923, to March 15, 1924, without presentation of said certificates of indebtedness of the coupons representing interest thereon from March 15, 1923, to March 15, 1924, which are alleged to have been lost, stolen, or destroyed: Provided, That the said certificates shall not have been previously presented for payment, and that no payments shall be made hereunder for any coupons which shall have been previously presented and paid: Provided further, That the said William Henry Boyce, sr., shall first file in the Treasury Department a bond in the penal sum of double the amount of the certificates and the interest which had accrued thereon when the principal became due and payable, in such form and with such securities as may be acceptable to the Secretary of the Treasury, to indemnify and save harmless the United States from any loss on account of the lost, stolen, or destroyed certificates of indebtedness herein described: Provided further, That this bill shall not take effect until September 15, 1924, which is six months after the maturity of the certificates.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I observe that the Secretary of the Treasury in writing an indorsement of the bill suggests that the fourth word in the first line of the second page of the printed bill is "of" instead of "or," and it is suggested that it be corrected. Of course, it is simply a typographical error.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state the amendment he proposes.

Mr. McKELLAR. In what line?

Mr. OVERMAN. The fourth word in the first line of the second page of the printed bill is "of" instead of "or," and it is suggested that it be corrected.

Mr. McKELLAR. That would not make sense. It reads "which are alleged to have been lost, stolen, or destroyed."

Mr. ROBINSON. The bill evidently has been corrected since the Secretary made his suggestion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerks suggest that that is simply a typographical error in the first print.

Mr. OVERMAN. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment. If there be no amendment to be proposed, the bill will be reported to the Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. OVERMAN. I ask, to accompany the bill and the report, that a letter of the Secretary of the Treasury be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The letter is as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, March 6, 1924.

Hon. REED SMOOT,
Chairman Committee on Finance, United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I have received a letter dated February 19, 1924, from Frank X. A. Eble, clerk of your committee, transmitting for report, on behalf of your committee, bill (S. 2510) for the relief of William Henry Boyce, sr., Ansonville, N. C., on account of the loss, theft, or destruction of 4½ per cent Treasury certificates of indebtedness Nos. 7378 and 7379 for $1,000 each, and No. 3371 for $500, series TM–1924, issued March 15, 1923, maturing March 15, 1924, payable to bearer, with coupons due September 15, 1923, and March 15, 1924, attached.

According to the department records, these certificates are still outstanding, and the coupons therefrom which matured on September 15, 1923, have not been paid. As stated in my letter to you of February 11, 1924, concerning another bill introduced for Mr. Boyce's relief, correspondence on file in the department shows that the certificates were purchased by Mr. Boyce in April, 1923, and were kept in the railway station at Ansonville, N. C., from which they were stolen on the night of June 29, 1923.

It is noted that S. 2510 follows the form of bill suggested by my letter of February 11, 1924, and that it provides that the bill shall not take effect until September 15, 1924, which is six months after the maturity of the certificates. Therefore the department will interpose no objection to the passage of this bill.

However, your attention is invited to the fact that through a typographical error the fourth word of the first line on the second page of the printed bill is written "of" instead of "or," and it is suggested that this be corrected.

A copy of this letter is inclosed.

Very truly yours,

A. W. MELLON,
Secretary of the Treasury.

BARGE "ANODE."

The bill (S. 78) for the relief of the owners of the barge Anode was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the claim of the Raritan Copper Works, owner of the American barge Anode, against the United States for damages alleged to have been caused by collision between said barge and the U. S. transport Buford, on the 18th day of January, 1919, between Governors Island and Bedloes Island, in New York Harbor, N. Y., may be sued for by the owner of the said barge in the United States District Court for the Southern District of New York, sitting as a court of admiralty and acting under the rules governing such court; and said court shall have jurisdiction to hear and determine such suit and to enter a judgment or decree for the amount of such damages, including interest, and costs, if any, as shall be found to be due against the United States in favor of the owner of the said American barge Anode, or against the owner of the said American barge Anode in favor of the United States upon the same principles and measures of liability as in like cases in admiralty between private parties and with the same rights of appeal: Provided, That such notice of the suit shall be given to the Attorney General of the United States as may be provided by order of the said court, and it shall be the duty of the Attorney General to cause the United States attorney in such district to appear and defend for the United States: Provided further, That said suit shall be brought and commenced within four months of the date of the passage of this act.

Mr. McKELLAR. Apparently the bill involves quite a large sum.

Mr. CAPPER. I call the attention of the Senator from Tennessee to the fact that the bill simply authorizes a suit to be brought.

Mr. McKELLAR. I see that. I withdraw the objection.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS PASSED OVER.

The bill (S. 82) for the relief of the owners of the steamship Comanche was announced as next in order.

Mr. McKELLAR. That is the same character of bill. It just refers the matter to the Court of Claims and allows a suit to be brought.

Mr. CAPPER. Yes.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I think it well to point out the fact that both these bills—the one now under consideration and the one just passed—authorize the rendition of a judgment upon the finding. It is not merely a case where the court makes a finding of fact and the matter comes back to Congress for an appropriation. The court is authorized to render judgment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. ROBINSON. I think we had better let it go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

Mr. McKELLAR. The other one ought to go over, too.

Mr. ROBINSON. I think the other one ought to go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that the votes whereby the preceding bill was passed be reconsidered and that the bill be returned to the calendar. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The bill (S. 84) for the relief of the owners of the steamship Ceylon Maru was announced as next in order.

Mr. McKELLAR. That seems to be in the same situation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

DANIEL S. GLOVER.

The bill (S. 788) to extend the benefits of the employers' liability act of September 7, 1916, to Daniel S. Glover was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the United States Employees' Compensation Commission shall be, and it is hereby, authorized and directed to extend to Daniel S. Glover, on account of the results of an injury sustained January 28, 1913, while in the performance of duty as an employee of the navy yard at Washington, D. C., the provisions of an act entitled "An act to provide compensation for employees of the United States suffering injuries while in the performance of their duties, and for other purposes," approved September 7, 1916.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOINT RESOLUTION PASSED OVER.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 4) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States relative to the adoption of amendments thereto was announced as next in order.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, this is a joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, and of course it should not be considered under the order of procedure that now governs the action of the Senate. It should be considered at another time. I ask that it go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The joint resolution will be passed over.

ACTIONS OF DEATH OR PERSONAL INJURY.

The bill (S. 314) concerning actions on account of death or personal injury within places under the exclusive jurisdiction of the United States was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on the Judiciary with an amendment, on page 1, line 6, after the word "States," to insert "within the exterior boundaries of any State," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the case of the death of any person by the neglect or wrongful act of another within a national park or other place subject to the exclusive jurisdiction of the United States, within the exterior boundaries of any State, such right of action shall exist as though the place were under the jurisdiction of the State within whose exterior boundaries such place may be; and in any action brought to recover on account of injuries sustained in any such place the rights of the parties shall be governed by the laws of the State within the exterior boundaries of which it may be.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILL PASSED OVER.

The bill (S. 2691) to amend the Penal Code was announced as next in order.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, this bill seems to be an amendment to the Penal Code. I believe that it ought to go over, because it appears that an explanation is necessary.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 2693) in reference to writs of error was announced as next in order.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, I suggest that the same observation could be made with reference to this bill that was made in reference to the one just passed over. The Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] is absent, and the bill will probably require some explanation. I suggest that it go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

WILLIAM MORTESEN.

The bill (S. 148) for the relief of William Mortesen was announced as next in order.

Mr. McKELLAR. May we have an explanation of that bill?

Mr. CAPPER. I ask that it go over until the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCNARY] is able to be here.

Mr. BROOKHART. I will explain it, unless the Senator from Tennessee desires to insist on the objection.

Mr. McKELLAR. I did not object. The Senator from Kansas objected. I merely wanted an explanation of it.

Mr. BROOKHART. While from the reading at the desk it might be thought that this is a bill allowing $20,000, the committee decided that, while this man did perform some valuable service they should cut the allowance down to $1,000. So it is not as important a matter as it would appear from the reading.

Mr. McKELLAR. What did the man do?

Mr. BROOKHART. He assisted in the recovery of some $215,000 worth of Government property.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I notice that the report of the Acting Secretary of the Interior is to the effect that the Government might be justified in paying the claimant a small sum, and the Acting Secretary suggests $500.

Mr. BROOKHART. $500 or $1,000. We allowed $1,000.

Mr. ROBINSON. I do not desire to contradict the statement of the Senator from Iowa, but I happen to have before me the report of the Acting Secretary, which is as follows on the point to which I have referred:

The agent, as you see, thinks the Government would be justified in paying Mr. Mortesen something, say $500, because of his services and because it would encourage others to render the Government assistance in such cases. I am constrained, however, to the conclusion that the precedent which would be created by the passage of this bill would result, not in benefits, but in most injurious consequences, both to the Government and to the citizens of the public-land States. I therefore conclude that the bill in question should not become a law.

From that statement I infer that the Acting Secretary would not even approve the recommendation of the agent of the Interior Department that the claimant receive, say, $500. He says he thinks it would establish a bad precedent. In that view of the matter, I think the bill ought to go over, at least for the present.

Mr. BROOKHART. That does not state the case accurately. If the Senator will get the agent's recommendation, he will find that he said from $500 to $1,000.

Mr. ROBINSON. I have no objection to trying the matter out now and letting the Senate pass on it, if the Senator from Iowa thinks it is of sufficient importance to delay the consideration of other bills which follow this on the calendar.

Mr. BROOKHART. I think it is as important as any other $1,000 measure.

Mr. SMOOT. Let me ask the Senator, if he has additional reports, if he will not have them printed, so that we can have them before us.

Mr. ROBINSON. The report I read refers to the statement of the agent, and in several other places quotes from Mr. Laughlin's report.

Mr. BROOKHART. I think that is correct as to the report of the department. We went through the whole case and examined the statement of the services the man performed and everything connected with it, and decided the recommendation of the agent was more justified than the conclusion of the department, and we reported $1,000 as the maximum amount.

Mr. ROBINSON. I ask that the bill may go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

RELIEF OF THE NEAR EAST RELIEF (INC.).

The bill (S. 87) for the relief of the Near East Relief (Inc.) was announced as next in order.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, this appears to be a very important bill. It is very far reaching, and unless there is some one here who is prepared to explain the bill and justify it I think it ought to go over.

Mr. WARREN. Let it go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

ADDITIONAL CLERKS FOR SENATORS.

The resolution (S. Res. 161) providing for an additional clerk for Senators not chairmen of committees during the Sixty-eighth Congress was next in order.

The resolution, submitted by Mr. REED of Pennsylvania, had been reported from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate with an amendment to substitute in lieu of the original resolution the following:

Resolved, That to each Senator (other than chairmen of committees to which additional clerks have been assigned) from a State having a population in 1920 of more than 8,000,000 persons there shall be allowed a special assistant clerk, to be paid at the rate of $2,400 per year. The salaries of such clerks shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate. Such clerkships shall continue during the Sixty-eighth Congress.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, there are several Senators who have expressed themselves as having some views they would like to submit on this resolution, and I do not know whether it is desirable to press it now or not. I remember the point was raised the other day that Senators objected to having help supplied on the basis of population, and it seems to me that is a pretty strong point to make. Unless there is some urgency why the resolution should be agreed to now, I think it ought to go over, in order to give Senators who are interested in the matter some opportunity to present their views.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, I think I have talked with all the Senators who expressed themselves on both the occasions when I made efforts to get the matter up. The last time that effort was made was when the Senate was in executive session, and objection then was made by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. COUZENS] to having the resolution come up when no record would be made of the remarks on it. The suggestion was also made by the senior Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES], who is now in the chair, that the resolution ought to carry a somewhat lower amount of compensation than the amount stated in it; but I do not know of any objection made to the allowance of the three clerks who would be carried by the resolution.

I beg the Senate to consider seriously the burden under which Senators from States of huge population now labor. As I have already said to some of the Senators, in explanation of the resolution, my incoming mail last year numbered over 100,000 pieces, and our office used, in actual typewritten letters, more than 40,000 letter sheets. The junior Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND], who is one of the Senators who would get a clerk under the resolution, has stated that it takes the time of one clerk for two hours and a half each morning merely to open the envelopes in which the mail comes and to lay the letters out flat without reading them.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, if I may interrupt the Senator at that point, I would like to say that that sort of work does not require very skillful or expert help. Opening letters and work of that sort might be compensated for at a little smaller salary than here provided, at perhaps $1,800.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. The Senator is quite right. Of course, to pay $2,400 for a clerk to merely open letters would be absurd; but the truth is that when the letters have been opened it requires a person of some discretion to answer them, and that is where our trouble comes.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I supposed that when the Senator referred to the number of pieces of mail received and the length of time it took to open them he was illustrating the quantity of mail received and the necessity for additional clerks.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Exactly.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. May the Chair ask the Senator whether or not any amendment is proposed to the resolution other than that reported by the committee?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. If it is the feeling that a $2,400 clerk ought not to be allowed, I for one will be very glad to amend the resolution and to put the clerk in such a class as the Senate thinks he ought to be put in. But let me say, before we take up that point, that at the present time my colleague [Mr. PEPPER], if he will not mind my saying it——

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, I will say it myself; I think we all regret that the number of Senators to be affected by the resolution is so small. Yet the situation with some of us is serious. I think I may without impropriety say that I have to pay out of my pocket $10,250 a year for extra clerical force in my office, and if this resolution passes it will not be in relief of what I pay out; it will be to enable me to get an additional clerk, that I may shorten the hours of labor of those in the office a little. We open at 8 in the morning and run to 7 in the evening, and there is some one there every evening.

As I said, in addition to the allowances made by the Government, during the last two years I have paid out of my own pocket $10,250 a year for clerical salaries. That is because of the enormous amount of mail matter and other matters requiring the consideration of the clerical force which come pouring in from the State of Pennsylvania. That is the basis upon which we submit the matter to the Senate.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, I want to suggest that it seems to me this is a matter of a good deal of importance, and I doubt whether we ought to try to dispose of it now. If we are going into a discussion of the work which devolves upon Members of the Senate who come from some of the larger States, it would be interesting to inquire as to just where we should draw the line.

I do not know how much mail matter has to be handled by the Senators from Pennsylvania, but if they have any more than the Senators from Ohio, they have an abundance. I rather doubt the desirability of fixing a limit of the sort fixed in the resolution. Something has been said about the number of pieces of mail that come in. Last week I sent out from my office in one day 1,200 pieces of mail, about 1,000 of which I signed myself.

This is a rather important question. I suggest, therefore, that the resolution go over.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Let me suggest to the Senate that I do not think any Senator ought to have to pay for necessary assistants out of his own pocket. I have always taken that position. But I do think it would be very unwise for us to provide for additional clerks at $2,400 a year, because every Senator then would come in and ask to have an additional clerk at $2,400 a year. I do think that these Senators ought to have additional help, and I understand from talking with them that if we would give them each an extra clerk at $1,600, they would agree to that. I think that when any Senator may come before the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate and say that he needs more help, it will be entirely proper to give him such help as he may say he needs. For these reasons, and knowing the great work these Senators have to do, I am in favor of passing some such measure as this.

Mr. McKELLAR. What salary does the Senator suggest?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Sixteen hundred dollars. We have clerks at $1,600 now, and I think we should put the new clerks in the same class with the clerks we have. If we should provide for another class at $1,800, every Senator would come in and ask for such a clerk.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, what the Senator from Washington has said illustrates the very point I had in mind. This matter of clerical help is of exceeding great importance to every Senator, and it ought to be a matter very carefully wrought out. I do not think we can dispose of the resolution fairly or satisfactorily in a hurried manner, and with the greatest regret I feel inclined to suggest that the matter go over until we may have an opportunity to work it out. We can not do that this morning.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, in order that the Senators from Pennsylvania may extend their views a little beyond the borders of their own State, I invite their attention, very kindly, to the fact that I come from a very remote State, which has some 4,000,000 population, and, due to the variety of industries, and to the further fact that it is a seaboard State, a border State, our correspondence is very, very great. Whilst I am not here appealing for additional assistants, I think I can make out a case quite as persuasive and conclusive as can my friends from Pennsylvania. Indeed, I am overburdened with correspondence, and employment of additional assistants in my office is necessary. Some months ago I was on the point of bringing up this matter with a view of asking for additional assistants.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Certainly.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Of course, we are all overburdened with mail. I base my plea on the statement I get from the Senate post office, that there is no mail received in the Senate that is comparable in amount with that which comes to the Senators from New York and the Senators from Pennsylvania.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the special order, Senate Joint Resolution 22, under the unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, it sounds as though I was discussing the previous question, but I am actually speaking on the matter now before the Senate. If the resolution which we have introduced for extra clerical help can not be adopted without defense we will not renew it. I suppose that in its present position on the calendar it will be the first matter taken up on the next call of the calendar, and I want to say my say, and say it finally.

At the present time the Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND], and the two Senators from Pennsylvania are paying out far more than our salaries for the extra clerical help that is in our offices here in the Senate Office Building. In other words, we are paying for the privilege of coming to Washington and being the target of all the blatherskites that want to call us names.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. The honor of the place is worth all that.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. The honor of the place is overwhelming, but the financial advantage that we get from it, all contrary imaginings in the country notwithstanding, is not very large. It is the fact that none of us is able, out of our salaries, to pay for that extra clerical help. I know all the other Senators are overwhelmed with their mails, too, but I base my statement on what I get from the post office of the Senate, that none of them compares in volume with what is coming to our offices every day. I know that it is a physical impossibility to read it all. I know that my clerks are working nights and Sundays and that they are unable physically to keep up with the strain, and I am unable financially to hire any more clerks.

I do not intend to make any further plea for the matter, and when it comes up on the call of the calendar the next time if it does not pass without further discussion I shall ask that it be indefinitely postponed, because I do not intend to be in the position of a beggar before my colleagues here in the Senate.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, I am sure that no one would think of the Senator from Pennsylvania as a beggar simply because he calls attention to a situation with which everybody is acquainted. I personally should be very sorry if he took that view of the question.

Now, here is the fact: Senators are overworked in the handling of their mail. There is no doubt about that. I think there ought to be more clerical help provided, particularly for the Senators from States with the larger populations. I have made no inquiry of the post office, but I dare say there is not very much difference between the amount of work that devolves upon the Senator from Pennsylvania and that devolving upon the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President——

Mr. WILLIS. I yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. PEPPER. The Senator has in mind the fact that the resolution, as originally introduced, was applicable to States with a population of 5,000,000 and over, and that in the form as advocated by the Senators from Pennsylvania it would have been applicable to the Senator's own State of Ohio. The elimination of the lower figure was not the work of the movers of the resolution, but was the action of the committee.

Mr. WILLIS. Oh, I understand that. There is no feeling about that at all, I assure my friend. I understand that perfectly. But this is not a matter that we can work out on the floor of the Senate. The matter ought to go to a committee that can give careful consideration to the whole subject, and determine what additional help is needed in order to enable Senators properly to handle their correspondence and at the same time have a little time for the consideration of the work in the Senate. I think the matter ought to go to one of the committees of the Senate for careful inquiry, and I hope the Senator from Pennsylvania will make that motion.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. The matter has already been before a committee.

Mr. WILLIS. What committee made inquiry?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. The Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, and it has been considered by that committee. The form in which the resolution now stands is an amendment which is an entire rewriting by that committee of the original resolution. I know that the Senator is similarly overwhelmed and the resolution as I introduced it called for an extra clerk for his office as well, because I know that the Senator from Ohio needs that extra clerk. But the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, in its wisdom, decided to amend the resolution. It has had its inquiry.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to his colleague?

Mr. WILLIS. I yield.

Mr. FESS. As a member of the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate I may say that we took the matter under advisement, and while we have no authority to amend a resolution it was suggested to the proponents of the resolution that we were disinclined to report it including all those names and that if they would limit it to the particular situation for this session or this Congress, we thought it was of sufficient value to recommend it. The amendment was made and we recommended it accordingly, and I sincerely hope that it may receive favorable consideration.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. WILLIS. I yield.

Mr. COPELAND. I hope the Senator from Ohio will withdraw his objection. The popular idea is that only a multimillionaire can come to the United States Senate, and I am beginning to think that is true. I find it necessary to pay out of my own pocket for additional help, and while I do not want to discriminate in any way against Senators from other States, and my State represents a population equal to 18 other States of the Union which I could name, yet my office has the same staff that the Senator from each one of those 18 States has. My State pays nearly 30 per cent of the taxes of the country.

The mail coming to my office, I am told, is the largest ever sent to a Senator's office. It is utterly impossible for the staff provided by the Government to take care of that mail. It is utterly impossible for me to hold the office and do any credit whatever to it unless I can answer the letters coming to my office. I am already hiring all the help I can afford to hire, and yet I have not help enough. If the Senate were good enough to grant this request I would still have to retain the additional help which I am now employing personally. I think it is only fair, and I would be glad to see every Senator who needs help given it. I would not myself have thought to bring the request before the Senate, but since the Senator from Pennsylvania has brought it here it is only right that the Senate should know exactly what the situation is. My people are overworked and it is only fair that these additional assistants should be given in order that the work may be properly done.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, I do not desire to prolong the discussion of a matter which is not technically before the Senate. I simply want to say, and I hope the Senator from Pennsylvania will give consideration to the suggestion, that in my opinion the matter should be referred to some committee. I understand it has been before the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, which is without authority to propose amendments to resolutions. Let it be referred to that committee or to some other committee, and let Senators be notified so that there can be a real inquiry as to the needs of the different Senators and see if some plan can not be worked out. Obviously a thing of this kind can not be settled just by snap judgment of this kind. I trust that action will be had.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I want to say just a word or two about the resolution of the Senator from Pennsylvania. I want to say to the Senator from Pennsylvania that I have had the same experience along the line that he is now having experience, not only with reference to lack of clerks but with reference to the situation in the Senate. I am not going to recite anything about that, but I want to suggest that the Senate, after a great deal of consideration in connection with the matter and after it had been agitated for two or three Congresses, provided what was thought to be ample permanent regular help. It provided, I think, for four clerks, one of them at $2,500, and that was larger pay than any of the clerks in the Senate had ever before been getting.

It was understood that Senators who needed additional help during the session of Congress could go before the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate and make their showing, and that reasonable allowance would be made. I do not believe in basing clerk hire or clerical help upon the population of the States. Furthermore, I think that four clerks are enough for every Senator during the recesses of Congress. I think Senators will agree that during the recesses of the Congress the four clerks should take care of the business.

Therefore I want to suggest two things. Any additional help of any kind that may be provided should be within the range of pay of the permanent clerks provided with certain salaries within that classification. We ought to provide for additional help within those classes and not provide for new clerks at $2,400, because if we do that other Senators—and it would be only just to the clerical help in their offices—would ask for commensurate salaries.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. I hope Senators will not take up a question that they know can not be disposed of here.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I shall be through in just a moment.

Mr. NORRIS. Some other Senator will want to follow on the same subject. It is an interesting subject, of course.

Mr. FESS. I only want to ask a question. Does not the Senator from Washington find trouble in securing a secretary or clerk at the salary fixed by the Senate?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Two thousand five hundred dollars is a pretty good salary, and we hope that may be increased ultimately. I have the same secretary I have had ever since I came to Congress 25 years ago. He started in at $1,200 a year and he is worth more than he is receiving.

Mr. FESS. I have found it necessary to combine the two salaries in order to get the man I want.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I have a very competent man. He ought to have more pay. I want to suggest that I think the resolution should go back to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate with the suggestions that have been made here, and that they should frame up a resolution that would take care of the situation and provide for clerks within the salaries already named and provide them for the sessions of Congress only. I am going to ask unanimous consent that the resolution be referred back to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate and they can take up the suggestions then.

Mr. McKELLAR. I think that is a very wise suggestion, and I hope the Senate will adopt it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Washington?

Mr. BRUCE. I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made.

CHANGE OF DATE OF INAUGURATION.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 22) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States fixing the commencement of the terms of President and Vice President and Members of Congress, and fixing the time of the assembling of Congress.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I think I ought to briefly explain the proposed amendment of the Constitution that is before the Senate.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me to offer an amendment?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. HARRIS. I offer an amendment to the pending joint resolution, which I ask may be read and be pending.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read for the information of the Senate.

The READING CLERK. On page 3, after line 3, insert the following new section:

The Executive power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America. He shall hold his office during the term of six years; and no person hereafter elected shall be eligible to reelection.

The President, together with the Vice President chosen for the same term, shall be elected as follows:

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, the proposition before the Senate is a resolution submitting to the States an amendment to the Constitution of the United States. In the original Constitution of the United States there was no time fixed for the beginning and the ending of terms of President, Vice President, Senators, or Members of the House of Representatives, but there was a time fixed for the terms of all those officers. There was fixed by statute the beginning of the new Government and the term. The commencement of the term of the first President, Vice President, Senators, and Representatives comprising the First Congress was fixed by an act of Congress adopted September 13, 1788, and that act provided that the first Wednesday of March should be the time for commencing proceedings under the Constitution.

It happened that the first Monday in March was the 4th of March that year; hence the beginning of the terms was on the 4th of March; and since the terms of President and Vice President were for four years, the terms of Senators six years, and the terms of the Members of the House two years, those terms, of course, ended on the 4th of March.

The proposition before the Senate is to fix the beginning of the terms. Briefly stated, the amendment provides that the beginning of the terms of President and Vice President shall be at noon on the third Monday in January, and the beginning of the terms of Senators and Representatives shall be at noon on the first Monday in January. Those dates are different in the amendment because under the Constitution the canvassing of the votes for President and Vice President must be made by the Senate and House of Representatives in joint session, and it was thought that there ought to be two weeks given for the purpose of canvassing those votes.

Inasmuch as the terms of Representatives and of a third of the Senate every two years expire on the 4th of March, it follows that one session of Congress is what we know as a short session, beginning on the first Monday in December and ending on the 4th of March. If this amendment be approved, there will be no such thing as a short session. I am not going, Mr. President, at this time, at least, to discuss the difficulties that always arise in a short session. Everyone who has had experience in Congress, I think, knows that the calendars are always clogged at that time, making it an impossibility for the Senate and House of Representatives to do good work, to do deliberate work, because the Members of Congress know that on the 4th of March they will have to cease, because the terms of the Members of the House of Representatives expire on that day.

So one effect of the adoption of this amendment would be to abolish the short session of Congress. Congress would begin in January in each year and would be limited in its sessions only by the expiration of the term of its Members, which would mean that a term might extend for an entire year, if necessary. It would do away with the congestion that always comes and with the bad legislation that always results from a congested condition.

Another effect of the adoption of the amendment would be that Members of Congress who are elected in November would be sworn into office the first Monday in January after their election, and would immediately enter upon the performance of their official duties. Under present conditions, unless a special session be called by the President, a Member of the Senate or of the House of Representatives who is elected in November does not actually take the oath of office until a year from the following December; 13 months after he is elected he is inducted into office. That, however, is not all.

During the time when a new Congress has been elected the old Congress is still in office, and has one session yet remaining; although its Members may have been repudiated by the people, they are still in office, and those whom the people have chosen are out of office. An issue settled at the preceding election is not determined or passed upon by the men whom the people of the country have elected to settle it. That condition would disappear.

Another effect of the adoption of the amendment would be this: Under our present Constitution, if an election does not result in a choice of President and Vice President, the election is thrown, respectively, into the House of Representatives and the Senate. As Senators know, in such case the House of Representatives proceeds to elect a President and the Senate proceeds to elect a Vice President. Under the Constitution, as it now stands, the election in the House of Representatives and in the Senate is performed by the old Congress; in other words, the people elect a new Congress in November in a Presidential election, and if they fail to elect a President the President is elected by the Congress then in office and not by the Congress which is elected at the last election. If this amendment is adopted and becomes a part of the Constitution and such a condition should arise—and it has arisen several times in the history of the country—the Congress which would elect a President would be the same Congress which was elected at the general presidential election; in other words, it would be the new Congress and not the old Congress that would elect the President and Vice President.

Still another thing would be accomplished by the amendment, if adopted. The Constitution in another part provides that if a vacancy occurs in the presidential office on account of the death, resignation, or removal of the President and the Vice President also, then Congress shall have power to designate who shall be the acting President.

Congress has acted under that law and has provided that in such case that the Secretary of State shall become President, and, in case something happens to him, the succession goes on down through the members of the Cabinet, so that there is no possibility of the country being left without a Chief Magistrate; but the Constitution does not make any provision in case the House of Representatives and the Senate both fail to elect a President whenever the election is thrown into Congress. If it should occur that there should be no election in November because no candidate should receive a majority of the electoral votes, and then the House of Representatives should fail to elect a President—which could very easily occur, because the election takes place by States—then the Vice President who is elected by the Senate would become President; but if the Senate also failed to elect a Vice President, there would be no one to take the office of President; and there is no provision in the Constitution which gives any authority to anyone to select a President under those circumstances.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Under the conditions contemplated by the pending joint resolution suppose that the Congress failed to elect would we not be confronted by a difficulty very similar to the one which now exists?

Mr. NORRIS. That would not be true unless Congress should fail to enact the law for which provision is made. If the House of Representatives should fail to elect a President, and the Senate should fail to elect a Vice President, the general law, as provided for in section 3 of the proposed amendment, would settle the question of who would be President.

I hope I may be understood. Let me refer to a condition which might arise: Suppose that at the next general presidential election the country should be so divided that no candidate would receive a majority of all the electoral votes, and, therefore, there would be no election. Under the existing Constitution the election of a President would then devolve upon the House of Representatives and the election of a Vice President would devolve upon the Senate. Let me follow that along. Suppose the House of Representatives should fail to elect a President, in that event the man elected Vice President by the Senate would become President. But suppose the Senate likewise failed to elect a Vice President, then who would become President? Nobody. Who would have authority to act under the Constitution? Nobody. There is not any authority delegated to Congress under the Constitution as it now stands in that kind of a condition to say who the President or the acting President shall be. It is not beyond possibility or even probability that the House of Representatives might fail to elect a President, because the Constitution provides that in that case the President shall be elected by States and that each State shall have one vote, so that it would take a majority of all the States to elect.

It can readily be seen that the House might be divided in a three-cornered fight in such a way that there would be no majority. It would not be so apt to happen that the Senate should fail to elect a Vice President, who, under those circumstances, would become President, because the Constitution provides that the Senate must elect the Vice President from the two highest names on the list. But if the Senate should be tied—and it has been tied on many votes on numerous occasions since I have been here—then there would not be any election. So while we were proposing to amend the Constitution by fixing the terms of office, we thought we might just as well provide for that contingency, because it is intermingled with another provision of the Constitution which we likewise had to change. The twelfth amendment of the Constitution provides the manner of the election of a President by the House of Representatives when the people have failed to elect. It says:

> And if the House of Representatives shall not choose a President whenever the right of choice shall devolve upon them before the 4th day of March next following, then the Vice President shall act as President.

Since we are proposing to change the expiration of the term of office from the 4th of March to the third Monday in January, it is important and necessary, in fact, to suggest the other amendment in order to make it a complete working machine. So we have said in section 3:

> If the House of Representatives has not chosen a President, whenever the right of choice devolves upon them, before the time fixed for the beginning of his term—

If this amendment is agreed to, that will be the third Monday in January—

> then the Vice President chosen for the same term shall act as President until the House of Representatives chooses a President; and the Congress may by law provide—

That is what I was speaking of a moment ago—> that in the event the Vice President has not been chosen before the time fixed for the beginning of his term, what officer shall then act as President, and such officer shall act accordingly until the House of Representatives chooses a President or until the Senate chooses a Vice President.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MCNARY in the chair). Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. ROBINSON. Under the present Constitution there is no provision for determining who shall serve as President in the event the election is thrown into the House of Representatives and the House fails to make a choice——

Mr. NORRIS. And the Senate fails also.

Mr. ROBINSON. And the Senate also fails to make a choice of Vice President.

Mr. NORRIS. That is right; yes, sir.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator's proposed amendment to the Constitution would authorize Congress by statute to make provision for such a possible contingency?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes, sir.

Mr. ROBINSON. So that under no conditions if this amendment should be submitted and ratified could the country be without a Chief Executive——

Mr. NORRIS. Exactly.

Mr. ROBINSON. Unless the Congress should fail to exercise the power conferred upon it by the amendment.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. ROBINSON. The proposed amendment, as I understand it, does not in any effect change the powers of the House of Reresentatives or of the Senate to choose the President and Vice President, respectively, in the event the electors chosen in the national election fail to make the choice?

Mr. NORRIS. No; there is no change in that respect.

Mr. ROBINSON. The only changes are as to the time when the term of office of Senators and Representatives shall expire and the provision already referred to that in the event the election is thrown into the Congress and that body is unable to make a choice, then by statute previously enacted Congress may prescribe the method of choosing a Chief Executive.

Mr. NORRIS. That is right; yes.

Mr. President, just one more word, and then I will take my seat.

The country mostly looks upon this amendment as having two aspects only. One is that a new Congress will go into office in January after the November election, instead of waiting 13 months. Another one is that it will do away with the short session of Congress and all its attendant evils and discomforts. There is, however, another matter which I have mentioned already, but I want to call attention to it again. To my mind it is an important thing.

When the election of a President is thrown into the House of Representatives, under the existing Constitution he is elected by the old House. Let us assume that in some presidential election there is a bitter contest over some important national proposition of legislation. Let us assume—and it is not an unreasonable assumption—that the House of Representatives and the Senate as they existed prior to the election had passed some legislation very obnoxious to the people of the country. Then place in the hands of that House and that Senate, both repudiated at the ballot box by the people of the United States, the power to elect a President and a Vice President for the next four years, and you have a picture before you that would almost lead to a revolution if the contest was over a question that was bitter enough.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON. This anomaly might also be presented: The party in power at the time of an election might be defeated in that election, so that if the old House of Representatives made the choice of a President, it might choose a President who belonged to a minority party, and in all probability would do so in case the control of the Government had passed in the election from one party to another.

Mr. NORRIS. Exactly; it would if it could; yes.

Mr. ROBINSON. Undoubtedly the present provision of the Constitution ought to be changed to safeguard against that kind of an emergency.

Mr. NORRIS. I thank the Senator.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. FESS. There is another contingency that might arise, and I am wondering whether the resolution of the Senator cures it. The Senator will remember that the meeting of the electors, at which time they vote for the candidate, is on the second Monday of January, and then the counting of the vote is on the second Wednesday of February.

Mr. NORRIS. I think it is the third Wednesday.

Mr. FESS. No; it is the second. I have just looked it up. If that were this year, it would fall on the 13th.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. FESS. Now, in case after the second Wednesday in February both the President and Vice President elect should be removed by death or any other cause before the 4th of March, there is no provision either in the Constitution or in the statutes for the election of the President. That matter has been before the country for a good many years. I introduced in the House a resolution on the subject, but never could get any recognition for it. In other words, when the electors meet and cast their votes it is supposed that the Electoral College is discontinued, and the count is made then in the House of Representatives. Does the Senator's resolution cure that situation?

Mr. NORRIS. No; it does not.

Mr. FESS. There ought to be something to cure it.

Mr. NORRIS. We undertook in this amendment to cure only the things and confine it to the things that were connected in the Constitution with the terms of President, Vice President, and Members of Congress.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I will yield to the Senator from Arizona in just a moment. The voting of the electors and the canvassing of the vote by the House of Representatives is fixed by statute, not by the Constitution. When this amendment is adopted we will have to change the statute and fix a different day for the counting of the vote and for the meeting of the electors in order to have it correspond to this.

Mr. FESS. But since the meeting time of the electors is fixed by statute, why could we not provide by statute that in case the contingency arose the electors would be called together again for the purpose of choosing a President? Could we not do that?

Mr. NORRIS. Probably. I think we could do that by a statute.

Mr. FESS. That is an interregnum that ought to be cured

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; I think it ought.

Now I yield to the Senator from Arizona.

Mr. ASHURST. I thank the Senator, but the matter has been covered, and it makes my question unnecessary.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, before the Senator takes his seat, I should like to make a suggestion. Under this amendment there will be two weeks after the Congress meets in which the President, if one is to be elected by the House, shall be elected. The Senator recalls that there have been times in the history of the House when the House has been unable to organize within two weeks, and I am wondering if two weeks is a sufficient time.

Mr. NORRIS. Does the Senator call to mind an occasion when they did not organize within two weeks?

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes; many years ago there was such an occasion. I looked it up once. I do not recall just what Congress it was, but it was only on one occasion. I am in entire sympathy with the amendment as proposed by the Senator. I think it is a very wise amendment.

Mr. NORRIS. I suppose there might be such a contingency; but suppose the House does not organize, and we pass a statute and provide that on a certain day, such as we have now—we now have the second Wednesday in February—after every presidential election the two Houses shall meet together. It would not follow that the House itself had not been organized. Even if they had not been organized, that meeting could be legal without any organization of the House itself.

Mr. McKELLAR. Does the Senator mean the meeting for the purpose of voting——

Mr. NORRIS. For the canvassing of the votes. When that meeting assembled, if there was a question about who was entitled to sit there, it could pass on that question itself, and I presume would if the question arose.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. ASHURST. The only instance where the House had a prolonged failure to organize was over the election of the Speaker, which arose, of course, from the circumstance that they require a majority vote. It is perfectly competent at any time for the other branch of Congress to provide that a Speaker may be elected by a plurality, and doubtless they would do that if a prolonged failure to organize should come about; but even if there should be a failure to elect a Speaker I do not perceive why the matter could not be arranged.

Mr. NORRIS. The joint assembly could meet just the same.

Mr. ASHURST. Precisely.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President, the Senator has given this subject considerable thought, and I should like to get his view as to what provision Congress would probably make to provide for the succession in the event neither the House nor the Senate elected?

Mr. NORRIS. Of course, I can not answer that question.

Mr. McLEAN. The Senator must have given it considerable thought, and it is important for us to anticipate as far as we can.

Mr. McKELLAR. Is it not probable that the same general law would be passed that is now passed for the succession—the Secretary of State, the Secretary of the Treasury, and so forth?

Mr. McLEAN. But we have not the same basis. We might not have any Secretary.

Mr. NORRIS. Not quite the same basis, although Congress could provide by law that that could be done. I anticipate that they probably would not use the same basis, because this is a new, incoming President, and the other vacancy that is provided for by law is one that happens during a term of office. Of course, there are an unlimited number of things that Congress might do. It would settle it on somebody.

Mr. McLEAN. I did not know but that it might have been discussed in the committee.

Mr. NORRIS. No; it was not.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, as I understand, Congress would have unlimited power to fix the method of selecting a President in case there was no election under the Constitution.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; and he would be an Acting President only. He would hold office only until the President was elected in the regular way.

Mr. SWANSON. Now, suppose Congress had passed no general law at the time this condition arose, and there was no general law providing how the vacancy should then be filled. Under this amendment, would it be in the power of Congress to name a specific person who should act as President at that time?

Mr. NORRIS. I suppose Congress could provide by law, if they wanted to, that when that contingency arose the House of Representatives or the Senate, either one, could select by a plurality vote instead of a majority vote an Acting President, who should hold his office until the real President was elected.

Mr. SWANSON. What I mean is this: Suppose Congress—the Senate and the House—should both be controlled by what are known as blocs, and be unable to reach an agreement, and possibly not want to reach an agreement, because in exercising this power the vote is not taken by States, but the Members vote individually to fill this vacancy and a majority elects. Suppose they should reach the conclusion that they could get somebody they wanted better by failing to act by States, and let some designated person be elected by a majority vote, not voting as States; could they do that under this law—designate an individual who should fill the office, instead of having it filled under a general law?

Mr. NORRIS. My idea is that the provision contemplates a general law that shall be passed before any emergency arises.

Mr. SWANSON. That is true; but suppose Congress had not passed a general law, although having power to do so, and preferred not to exercise its power to vote by States but to have the Members vote as individuals. That would really give it the power, would it not, to nullify the Constitution and not have an election, and proceed to elect somebody by voting as individuals?

Mr. NORRIS. Oh, no. In the first place, in the kind of a contingency that the Senator mentions, he has not taken into consideration the Senate. If the House failed to elect, then the Senate would.

Mr. SWANSON. But I assume that neither the House nor the Senate acts. You can not compel a man to vote for one of two individuals and thus get a majority.

Mr. NORRIS. I understand that; but let us take it as it is now. Suppose what the Senator outlines should happen. There is not any power on earth, in heaven or below, given to anybody to select a President, and we would be without anybody at the head of the Government.

Mr. SWANSON. The reason why I am asking these questions is that at some time in the future what the Senator says as the author of this joint resolution may be used as an interpretation of what was in the legislative mind, as the courts very frequently do; and I can see where we might have blocs in the Senate and blocs in the House, and be unable to elect either a President or a Vice President. At the time when John Quincy Adams was elected a vacancy compelled those people to get together, and consequently they elected a President. They might prefer to get rid of the system of voting in the House of Representatives and in the Senate by States, and refuse to exercise the power under the Constitution to make an election. Then the question I want to ask the Senator, who is the author of this joint resolution, is this: As I understand, this joint resolution requires the office to be filled by a law previously passed?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. SWANSON. If they have not previously passed a law, then, as I understand this constitutional amendment——

Mr. NORRIS. If they have not previously passed a law, then we are just exactly where we would be if we had not adopted the amendment.

Mr. SWANSON. What I wanted distinctly understood, so that the Congress could not have any excuse for trying to prevent an election under the existing Constitution, was this: As I understand the Senator, if there is no law existing at that time to fill the vacancy, under failure of Congress to act, then the existing Constitution prevails.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes. I do not mean to say, however, that even in that condition Congress could not pass a law then if it had not done it before.

Mr. SWANSON. Could Congress at that time say, "We vote in the majority in the House and Senate that Mr. A shall exercise the office of President until Congress acts under the Constitution"?

Mr. NORRIS. Congress could do that if they had a proper law, under the Constitution itself.

Mr. SWANSON. I mean without a law could they just designate Mr. A as President?

Mr. NORRIS. No.

Mr. SWANSON. The Senator does not believe they could?

Mr. NORRIS. I do not.

Mr. SWANSON. The Senator thinks they must provide for succession by a general law?

Mr. NORRIS. I think so.

Mr. SWANSON. That is the Senator's interpretation of it?

Mr. NORRIS. That is my interpretation of it.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I wish to submit some brief observations on this joint resolution.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CARAWAY in the chair). Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. ASHURST. I yield.

Mr. ADAMS. I want to make an inquiry of the Senator from Nebraska, if I may. It is a question rather of phraseology. I was wondering why in the drafting of the amendment the Senator eliminated the provision fixing a definite time for the beginning of the terms. I am referring to section 3. In that section the Senator provides that "whenever the right of choice devolves upon them, before the time fixed for the beginning of his term, then the Vice President," and so forth. In the original provision in the Constitution it was provided that whenever there was a failure to elect "before the 4th of March," and so forth. I was wondering the reason for not fixing the time, which was provided in section 1 of the article.

Mr. NORRIS. I will say to the Senator that it would be just the same as if we fixed that time; but the idea of putting in the language we have employed here was this, that in case the people ever amended this amendment again, fixing the term of office, and so forth, it would be unnecessary for them likewise to amend section 3. In other words, in the twelfth amendment to the Constitution, from which the Senator has just read, it is provided that if they shall not have elected a President "before the 4th day of March," and so forth. If that had not been provided, if they had said there, "have not elected a President until the time fixed for the beginning of his term," it would be unnecessary to make this amendment now proposed. In other words, we are putting it in general terms, which would apply even as it stands now, and it would be the same likewise if another amendment should afterwards be adopted changing the term.

Mr. ADAMS. It may be a matter of English. I was disturbed in part by the last section, where it was said that the Congress may by law provide that in the event a Vice President has not been chosen before the time fixed for the beginning of his term, and so forth. That is, there seems to be a sort of personal pronoun attached to the term rather than a definition of an abstract term. I was wondering whether or not some very exact person, such as we have in some of our discussions, would not say that the pronoun "his" referred back to some particular individual?

Mr. NORRIS. Of course, it refers to the Vice President. The Senator has no doubt about that, has he?

Mr. ASHURST. The word "his" in line 21 would refer to its nearest antecedent, I think.

Mr. NORRIS. The beginning of the term and the ending of the term are just exactly the same as those of the President.

Mr. ADAMS. It does seem to me the language should be accurate.

Mr. ASHURST. Does the Senator from Colorado think it should be "the term" instead of "his term?"

Mr. ADAMS. I think so. The same suggestion would apply all through. The reference is always to "his" term, both in reference to the President and the Vice President.

Mr. NORRIS. It reads:

> If the House of Representatives has not chosen a President, whenever the right of choice devolves upon them, before the time fixed for the beginning of his term.

Mr. ASHURST. I think "the term" might be an improvement.

Mr. NORRIS. My own idea is that "his" is better because it refers to the President, and the pronoun above should be "his," it seems to me, although I think the meaning would be just the same.

Mr. McKELLAR. Referring to the situation suggested by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] that the Congress might not act under the last provision of section 3, would it strengthen the matter at all to make it the duty of Congress to act by substituting in line 23 the word "shall" for the word "may," so that it would read, "and the Congress shall by law provide," and so forth?

Mr. NORRIS. Line 23?

Mr. McKELLAR. Line 23, to substitute "shall" for "may," so as to make it read: "And the Congress shall by law provide." That would impose a duty upon Congress instead of merely giving it the power.

Mr. NORRIS. I think the legal effect would be just the same.

Mr. McKELLAR. Perhaps so. I know the terms are very frequently used interchangeably.

Mr. SWANSON. I have an idea that a contingency might arise in which some party, either the Democratic or the Republican Party, I am not saying which, might reach a conclusion that it could attain its desires by not exercising the power to elect by States, but by electing by a majority of Congress, counting the individual votes of the States. They might refuse to elect under the express constitutional provision, and then, having not provided by law what they should do, would insist they had the right, as Congress voting as individual States, to proceed to designate somebody who should hold the office until they exercised their power otherwise, which they would never do if they got somebody who suited them.

I have an idea that if the word "shall" were put in there, Congress, before the contingency arose, when the situation is not such as to offer inducements to fail to exercise this power because they can accomplish their purpose by a majority vote, would proceed to act, and we would not have that contingency preventing an election in the constitutional manner.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I am inclined to think that the Senator from Virginia is correct about that, and I hope the Senator from Nebraska will accept an amendment, to substitute the word "shall" for "may."

Mr. NORRIS. Personally, I do not see any objection to changing the word "may" to "shall."

Mr. McKELLAR. Very well. Then I ask unanimous consent, Mr. President, that the vote by which the amendment on page 2, beginning with line 18, was agreed to, be reconsidered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the vote will be reconsidered.

Mr. McKELLAR. Now, I move that, on page 2, line 23, in the committee amendment, the word "may" be stricken out and that there be inserted in lieu thereof the word "shall," so as to read:

> And the Congress shall by law provide that in the event the Vice President has not been chosen—

And so forth.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, in Article II, section 1, the Constitution now ordains that the President and Vice President shall hold office for the term of four years, but it does not provide when the term shall commence. The only recognition of the 4th of March succeeding the day of a presidential election as the day of the commencement of the terms of President and Vice President is the provision in the twelfth amendment of the Constitution, effective September 25, 1804, as follows:

> If the House of Representatives shall not choose a President whenever the right of choice shall devolve upon them, before the 4th day of March next following, then the Vice President shall act as President as in the case of the death or other constitutional disability of the President.

The twelfth amendment was adopted by reason of the unfortunate tie in the Electoral College in 1800 between Thomas Jefferson and Aaron Burr.

In 1824 there were four candidates contesting for the Presidency, and no one secured a majority in the Electoral College. Under the Constitution the election was relegated to the House of Representatives to ballot by States for three of the candidates. That eliminated Henry Clay from the balloting, because they dropped the lowest one, according to the constitutional provision, and, voting by States, it resulted in the election of John Quincy Adams.

Within our own time, to wit, in 1912, a number of thoughtful persons believed for a while that there might again arise a condition where the election of a President would be thrown into the House of Representatives.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, in 1824, when John Quincy Adams was elected, he was a minority candidate, and Andrew Jackson had the largest number.

Mr. ASHURST. That is quite true, and I thank the Senator for that observation.

Suppose that in 1912 the election had been thrown into the House of Representatives. There were then, as there are now, 48 States. There were 22 delegations in the short session of the Sixty-second Congress that were Republican in majority, 22 delegations that were Democratic in majority, and 4 delegations which were tied. Senators will therefore perceive that in our own time there might have been a hiatus in the presidential office, for it is not entirely beyond the doamin of speculation that the ties might not have been broken. So we perceive that, as constructive statesmen dealing with problems of the hour, it behooves us to anticipate reasonable contingencies.

The provision from the twelfth amendment I have read would probably be construed to be a provision that the term of the President expired on the 4th of March after a presidential election—that a vacancy then exists—in which event the then Vice President succeeded to the office.

The time when the presidential electors shall be elected and the date on which they shall meet and give their vote is, by Article II, section 1, of the Constitution, left to the discretion of Congress, with the restriction that the day of voting shall be the same throughout the United States. An act was passed February 3, 1887, requiring them to meet and give their vote on the second Monday in January next after their appointment, in such place in each State as the legislature thereof shall direct; which vote, duly certified, to be delivered to the President of the Senate before the first Wednesday in February, and be canvassed by Congress, in joint session, on the second Wednesday in February thereafter.

The Constitution, while providing that Representatives shall hold their offices for two years—Article I, section 2—and Senators for six years—Article I, section 3—does not provide when the terms shall commence.

The commencement of the terms of the first President and Vice President, and of the Senators and Representatives composing the First Congress, was fixed by a resolution of Congress adopted September 13, 1788, providing "that the first Wednesday in March next—which happened to be the 4th day of March—be the time for commencing proceedings under the Constitution."

Congress has provided—act of March 1, 1792, Revised Statutes, section 152—that the terms of the President and Vice President shall commence on the 4th day of March next succeeding the day on which the votes of the electors have been given, but there seems to be no statute enacted since the adoption of the Constitution fixing the commencement of the terms of Senators and Representatives.

I favor this joint resolution for the following reasons. I will state them as distinctly as I may:

Under the present law Congress does not convene in regular session until 13 months after the election of its Members. There was some reason for such a provision at the time of the formation of our Government, as it then took a long time to ascertain the results of elections and to reach the Capital from remote parts of the country. But there is no excuse whatever now, since the most distant States of the Union are within a few days' travel of Washington.

Senators heretofore have been elected by the legislatures of the States in January, and sometimes not until February or March. But since the adoption of the seventeenth amendment to the Constitution, by which Senators are to be elected by the people, usually at the November election, it becomes opportune for Congress to convene in January following. The convening of Congress on the first Monday of December, as at present, is inopportune, as adjournment for the Christmas holidays is always taken and many Members go to their homes, returning late, which precludes any real work until January.

Some of the reasons for the adoption of the proposed amendment are:

Congress should at the earliest practicable time enact—within the limits of the Constitution—the principles of the majority of the people, as expressed in the election of each Congress. That is why the Constitution requires the election of a new Congress every two years. If it be not to reflect the sentiment of the people these frequent elections have no meaning nor purpose. Any evasion of this meaning is subversive of the fundamental principle of our Government, that the majority shall rule. No other nation has its legislative body convene so long after the expression of the people upon governmental questions.

During the campaign preceding a congressional election the great questions that divide the political parties are discussed for the purpose of determining the policy of the Government and of having the sentiments of the majority crystallized into legislation. It seems to be trifling with the rights of the people when their mandates can not be obeyed within a reasonable time. It is unfair to an administration that the legislation which it thinks so essential to the prosperity of the country should be so long deferred. It is true an extraordinary session may be called early, but such sessions are limited generally to one or two subjects, which of necessity make for enormous waste of the time of each House, waiting for the other to consider and pass the measures.

As the law is at the present time, the second regular session does not convene until after the election of the succeeding Congress. As an election often changes the political complexion of a Congress, under the present law many times we have the injustice of a Congress that has been disapproved by the people enacting laws for the people opposed to their last expression. Such a condition does violence to the rights of the majority. A Member of the House of Representatives can barely get started in his work until the time arrives for the nominating convention of his district. He has accomplished nothing, and hence has made no record upon which to go before his party or his people. This is an injustice both to the Member and to the people. The record of a Representative should be completed before he asks an indorsement of his course.

Under the present system a contest over a seat in the House of Representatives is seldom, if ever, decided until more than half the term, and in many instances until a period of 22 months of the term has expired. For all that time the occupant of the seat draws the salary, and when his opponent is seated he also draws the salary for the full term; thus the Government pays twice for the representation from that district. But that is not the worst feature of the situation; during all of that time the district is being misrepresented, at least politically, in Congress.

This amendment if adopted would eliminate the short session of Congress. It is my opinion that the short session is not a good institution. It has been the source of much criticism and ought to be abandoned. No vital governmental questions can be considered during a short session.

By Congress meeting the first Monday in January succeeding the elections, contested-election cases may be disposed of at least during the first six months of the Congress.

The President and Vice President should enter upon the performance of their duties as soon as the new Congress can count the electoral votes. The newly elected governors of the States are inducted into office as soon as the new legislatures of the States canvass the votes and declare their election. It is the old Congress which now counts the electoral votes. It is dangerous to permit the defeated party to retain control of the machinery by which such important officers are declared elected.

In the event that no candidate for President receives a majority of the electoral votes, the Constitution provides that the House of Representatives shall elect the President, each State having one vote. At the present time it is the old Congress that elects the President under such contingency, and thereby it becomes possible for a political party repudiated by the people to elect a President who was defeated at the election. Under the present provision of the Constitution, in the event the House fails to choose a President before the 4th of March, then the Vice President then in office becomes President for four years. This affords a temptation by mere delay to defeat the will of the people, and if it is ever exercised it will cause grave consequences.

It is true that January weather might be inclement for an inaugural parade, but that is a reason too insignificant to constitute an argument against a constitutional amendment which promises so much for good government. Nearly all the governors of the States are inaugurated in January. The pomp and ceremony which usually attend the coronations of monarchs are at least not necessary to a republic.

One of the finest things the late President Harding ever did was to say to the appropriate authorities that he wished as little display as possible, and when hundreds of thousands of dollars were about to be appropriated to cause a great inaugural display he sent word that he wished no such expenditure. It was entirely commendable, and the country in general approved it.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield again?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. ASHURST. I take pleasure in yielding.

Mr. FESS. Has the Senator gone into the matter of time so as to be certain in his own mind that we are giving enough time between the election and the inauguration?

Mr. ASHURST. Yes; the electors will be chosen at the general elections held the first Tuesday following the first Monday in November.

Mr. FESS. Just as they are now.

Mr. ASHURST. Yes; just as they are now. I am of opinion, barring some odd mischance that might happen in human affairs, that there will be ample time between the general election in November and the assembling of the electoral college to canvass the returns and to declare the results. The electors meet in their own States. Travel now is easily accomplished—that is, compared to travel in bygone days. Travel by automobile, by railroad, or by other means is so easily negotiated now that I do not perceive how in any State, even the largest, it could be possible for the electors to fail to reach the appropriate place in their State and assemble and cast their votes within the 30 days. The electoral colleges certify their returns in the following manner. I am quoting from memory only. They send one set of returns or votes to the Presiding Officer of the Senate——

Mr. FESS. By mail.

Mr. ASHURST. One by mail—I thank the Senator for the reminder—and one set by messenger. That was authorized to be done in the old days when mails were uncertain. Fearful that the messenger might be lost, fearful that the mail might be lost, they also file a copy or a set thereof with the clerk of the United States district court, the appropriate Federal court in their State. So there really are three sets of returns, and if the messenger fails to reach here with the returns and the mails fail to arrive, recourse may be had under the Constitution to the returns on file in the Federal court.

Mr. FESS. The resolution does not change that?

Mr. ASHURST. No; the resolution does not change that. Now we have reached in the point of time the middle of December. The electoral colleges give their vote and the colleges dissolve. Congress meets the first Monday in January. I fancy it would be an odd mischance only if Congress should fail to organize within two weeks. The President would be inaugurated on the third Monday in January.

I have not assumed an attitude of consciousness, nor do I pretend to have more knowledge of this subject than other Senators, but I will say that this subject is one to which I have given close study and scrutiny for years. It was before the Committee on the Judiciary some years ago.

Mr. FESS. The Senator from Ohio had that understanding, and that is why he has been asking the questions. The only difficulty I had was whether, if there was a possible contest in the election in November, it might not be settled up to the time of the meeting of Congress.

Mr. ASHURST. Assuming a contest in one of the States, we will say in State M or State O, the contest is initiated and is carried on until and beyond the time of the meeting of the electoral colleges. There was, I think, some question in the election of 1872. Either the candidate died or some of the electors died, but at least they avoided the difficulty by certifying that by not counting the State involved, or by counting it against them, the candidate nevertheless would have a majority of the electoral colleges.

It is very like when King William III was placed upon the English throne. The able lawyers of that day doubted the constitutionality of the act. I have forgotten the name of the English statesman who led the way and who said, as a man shouted, "We are lost, and I shall not travel except upon the King's highway, but I do not know where it is."

We have been groping for a time in uncertainty on this question. We can not have before us a provision that will anticipate every difficulty, but I do think that we may measurably anticipate the main difficulties that may arise. I realize that the element of time is one of the difficulties, but in the day of telegraph, telephone, airplane, and all those conveniences that make for speedy communication and that make for speedy transmission, not only of words and papers but of persons, I think we need not reasonably anticipate any difficulty as to time. I thank the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. ASHURST. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. I apprehend that the two months between the election in November and the meeting of the Congress in January should be amply sufficient to settle such controversies as might arise. I do not think it ought to be carried beyond that time. It seems to me the first Monday in January——

Mr. ASHURST. That is when the Congress would convene.

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes; that would give ample time. There is some doubt in my mind, however, as to whether two weeks is sufficient time for the House of Representatives to meet and organize where there is a hot contest, and pass upon the matter and elect a President. That is the only question I have.

Mr. ASHURST. I would like to have the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] hear this.

Mr. NORRIS. I am listening.

Mr. ASHURST. The Senator from Tennessee makes the observation that he is convinced that the time is ample with respect to the general election and the meeting of the Electoral College, but he suggests that he has some fears that there might not be sufficient time for the Congress to organize. I would like to call the attention of the Senator from Nebraska to that point.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WILLIS in the chair). Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. ASHURST. With pleasure.

Mr. NORRIS. As a matter of practical application, if the amendment were agreed to, the time would be in reality the same as it is now. That is fixed by statute. Under the existing statute the House and the Senate meet in joint session on the second Wednesday in February.

Mr. ASHURST. That is true.

Mr. NORRIS. That is, in round numbers, only two weeks until the 4th of March, and under the amendment they would have from the first Monday until the third Monday in January, which is practically the same time. There has no contingency arisen where that time has been too short.

Mr. McKELLAR. The only difference is that under the proposed amendment the new Congress would have to meet and organize, but under the Constitution as it is now the old Congress is already organized and is ready for business.

Mr. NORRIS. Let us suppose, for instance, that they had not organized. There has never been an instance in history except the one stated here to-day, except where they failed in the election of a Speaker.

Mr. ASHURST. There never was but the one protracted failure to organize.

Mr. NORRIS. Let us assume that they have not elected a Speaker, and that we had fixed by statute the first Tuesday after the first Monday in January that the joint session shall take place. That would be a day after Congress assembled, and the House had not elected a Speaker.

On that day the joint session under the statute which we would pass, let us say, would meet in the Hall of the House of Representatives. Suppose the House of Representatives has not organized, but the Vice President and Senators go over there and the Members of the House of Representatives come in, not because they have been organized but because they are Members of the House of Representatives; and suppose the question should arise as to whether some particular man was entitled to a seat as a Member of the House of Representatives; in that imaginary condition—to conceive of which requires, I think, a stretch of the imagination—that joint body would decide whether such a man was or was not a Member.

Mr. REED of Missouri. How could that body decide?

Mr. NORRIS. Because the Constitution provides that on a certain day a certain number of men, Members of the House of Representatives and Members of the Senate, shall meet.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Yes; but each House is the sole judge of the qualifications of its own Members.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; and the House might meet afterwards and throw out by expulsion three-fourths of the men who participated in the joint meeting. That could be done now.

Mr. REED of Missouri. It could be done now.

Mr. NORRIS. The House could do it under the existing Constitution if it had the necessary votes.

Mr. McKELLAR. But they would not be very likely to do it.

Mr. REED of Missouri. It would not be possible under the existing Constitution, because the Congress has already been organized and has been running for two years.

Mr. NORRIS. That would not prevent a man from being expelled from either the Senate or the House of Representatives.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Mr. President, I do not wish to interrupt the Senator from Arizona.

Mr. ASHURST. I yield to the Senator from Missouri with pleasure.

Mr. REED of Missouri. But I should like to get an understanding of this situation with the seven or eight Members of the Senate who are present considering a proposed amendment to the Constitution. There may be a moral satisfaction in it.

At the present time the old Congress, which is fully organized, which has been transacting business for approximately two years, counts the electoral votes. If there is no election, then the House of Representatives, as provided in the Constitution, proceeds to elect a President, the vote being by States.

The House is then an organized body; it has been in existence for two years. It is true there may be some contests dragging along, but that is of such slight importance we need not consider it. Under the proposed constitutional amendment a new Congress will have assembled, and there will have been an election; but suppose the House of Representatives is unable to organize and therefore unable to determine who are prima facie entitled to seats. It is easy enough to conceive of a situation of that kind. The time arrives for counting the electoral votes, and there are asembled two bodies of men. The Senate, we will presume, is organized in some form, because it is in a sense at least a continuing body. The House of Representatives is wholly unorganized. There march into the Hall of the House of Representatives certain gentlemen whose credentials have never even been passed upon, and we may have——

Mr. NORRIS. Will the Senator yield there?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. ASHURST. I do.

Mr. NORRIS. Under the law as it now exists those credentials are passed along before Congress meets. In the case to which reference has been made where Members of the House had failed to elect a Speaker, they had all been sworn into office before that occurred.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Yes, but——

Mr. NORRIS. The Clerk of the House under a general law takes the credentials and makes up the list of Members from the returns. The Members are all sworn into office before they elect a Speaker. The failure to elect a Speaker would not be an important thing at all.

Mr. REED of Missouri. I am not talking about the election of the Speaker; we can go back of that; we can presume an absolute condition of disorganization, of which it is easy enough to conceive. This unorganized body, this unofficered body of men march into the Hall of the House of Representatives and proceed to vote, and the election may turn upon one vote. That is the condition, it seems to me, which is presented by this joint resolution. That is aside from certain merits which the resolution may possess, but I am calling attention to that situation and asking if such a condition might not happen.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, the point made by the able Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] is worthy of consideration, but—and I address myself to the learned Senator because he is one of the ablest lawyers not only of the Senate but of the United States—let us assume that there is no majority in the Electoral College. No person therefore is chosen to be President, and thus the choosing of a President is relegated to the House of Representatives. Assume now that the seats of a number of Members of the House are under contest. We will say, for example, that the seats of 20 Members are under contest; but the contested Members have certificates of election; they hold them prima facie; they are on the roster; they are de facto Members. I need not say to such a good lawyer as is the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] that the acts of de facto officers are valid. Let us assume, moreover, that the election of the President should actually turn and revolve upon and be brought about by the votes of those de facto Members under contest and subsequently they were found not to be de jure Members and hence were displaced by other Members under our Constitution and jurisprudence the election participated in by them would be unassailable because the acts of de facto officers acting within the sphere of their legitimate functions and authority are valid.

There will always be in a body as numerous as the House of Representatives some seats contested. And of course some of the contests will be sustained and some will fail, and in some cases the sitting Member who has a certificate of election will be ousted and his contestant seated; but the learned Senator from Missouri would be the last to say that an act of Congress could be assailed successfully, although it were passed by a majority of one vote, and that one vote was cast by a de facto Member, or sitting Member, who thus turned the scales in favor of the bill and who was subsequently turned out of office. So while I admit there is some force in the suggestion that there might be a possibility of such a contingency as the Senator from Missouri suggests, I do not believe it is of such immediate prospect as to be of great weight.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. ASHURST. I yield.

Mr. ADAMS. May I suggest another contingency which occurs to me? It is provided in the joint resolution that in the event of the failure of the House of Representatives to elect a President, then the Vice President chosen for the same term shall act as President, but he shall only act until the House of Representatives chooses a President. The House of Representatives having failed to elect a President, the Vice President going in as President, thus substituted, is subject continually and during the whole period, not only of two years but four years, not only in that Congress but in the next Congress, to the will of the House of Representatives and may be set aside at any time by the House of Representatives electing a President.

Would not that place the Executive, under those conditions, under the dominance of the House of Representatives? I am in favor of the plan of the proposed constitutional amendment; but it seems to me, as I read its provisions, that in such a contingency the House of Representatives at any time can step in and set aside the Vice President by proceeding to elect a President, and that may be done not only by the House of Representatives that canvasses the result but also by the ensuing Congress, as the proposed amendment really says "until the House of Representatives chooses a President."

Mr. ASHURST. The Senator has raised a question of considerable import, and it is a tribute to his sagacity that he can foresee such a contingency. I might just as well now make the statement that in war, in politics, and in statesmanship contingencies are always going to arise that no sagacity can anticipate and that no statesmanship can obviate.

The Senator from Colorado has asked a pertinent question. Mark you, now, that is the case where the election is relegated to the House; the House chooses from the three candidates receiving the highest number of electoral votes, whilst the Senate chooses the Vice President from the two candidates receiving the highest number of votes for Vice President. The House having failed to elect a President before the third Monday in January, and the Senate having performed its function and having elected a Vice President before the third Monday in January, then the Vice President becomes President, and in such capacity, under this resolution, he would act as President until the House of Representatives chooses a President.

Mr. ADAMS. My suggestion is that that is a definite variation from the existing condition. The Constitution now provides that when the Vice President shall be selected as President he shall become actually President and shall not be subject to removal by the House of Representatives.

Mr. ASHURST. That is a hiatus in the present Constitution. I will say that whilst the framers of the Constitution were learned and patriotic men, being human, they could not comprehend all the knowledge in the world and could not anticipate every contingency, and this happens to be one of them. Another one is that there is not known any method of ascertaining when and how a President is unable to perform the functions of his office. That is another one of the hiatuses in the Constitution. If the President should become disabled to perform the duties of his office, and the Vice President under the present system were to assume office, when, and if the disability were removed, would the Vice President continue to be President or would he return to the Vice Presidency? That is a question upon which we have never been called to act, but I think under the language of this proposed amendment the Vice President would act as President until the House of Representatives chose a President. Now the Senator's query as to how long the acting President would continue to act and whether the succeeding Congress could elect a President is a question that I hope he will not press upon me, because I would not want to express an opinion without more reflection. But even with that contingency unanticipated, I do not think enough argument has yet been put into the scales against this joint resolution fairly to defeat it.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ASHURST. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. May I have the attention of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. ADAMS]? I observe that in the question which the Senator asked the Senator from Arizona he stated correctly what this amendment does and what the existing provision does. It changes it. The Vice President, under this amendment, would be Acting President in the case he put. Personally, I agree with the idea expressed by the Senator from Colorado; and if he will look at section 3 as I introduced it and as the committee struck it out he will see that I provided there that in the same contingency that he is speaking about the Vice President shall act as President, as in the case of the death or other constitutional disability of the President.

The subcommittee of the Committee on the Judiciary, however, had a different idea and put it in the form of section 3, which changes it. The Senator can easily test the sense of the Senate on it by moving to strike out on line 22, beginning with the word "until" and ending with the word "President" on line 23, and inserting the same language that is used in the latter part of line 11, "As in the case of the death or other constitutional disability of the President." Does the Senator catch the idea I am trying to convey?

There is a clear disagreement, a very honest one—and I confess that the Committee on the Judiciary rather converted me to the other idea from what I had—as to whether in an emergency, where the House fails to elect, and the Vice President takes the office, he should remain as President for four years or whether the House should still have the opportunity to elect a President; and if they elected a President the Vice President, of course, instead of being Acting President, would become Vice President again.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, we have heard much lately of maintaining the independence of the Executive. If it is put in that shape, we will destroy the independence of the Executive when that condition arises.

Mr. NORRIS. Of course, I can not make the motion, but, as far as I am personally concerned, I have no objection to the amendment that I have suggested that the Senator offer. In fact, that was the way I wanted it originally.

Mr. ASHURST. I have no objection to the amendment.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator must not forget that section 3 in its original form did not make the provision that is necessary to be made if we want to meet that contingency in the latter part of section 3; but it could be easily amended as I have suggested if the Senate wants to amend it in that way.

Mr. ADAMS. I will offer that amendment when I have an opportunity. I move that, beginning——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair advises the Senator that an amendment is now pending. The Senator can offer the amendment and have it taken up later, but there is an amendment pending.

Mr. ADAMS. Very well.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, that amendment has already been adopted. I think the Senator will have to move to reconsider and be permitted to offer the amendment.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I understand that the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARRIS] has moved an amendment to the proposed constitutional amendment, which reads as follows:

> The executive power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America. He shall hold his office during the term of six years; and no person hereafter elected shall be eligible to reelection.
> The President, together with the Vice President chosen for the same term, shall be elected as follows.

Mr. President, I am opposed to this amendment. I believe that the permanent usefulness and stability of a democracy like ours depends upon frequent elections. I believe in short terms of office. It is through frequent elections that confidence in government is best secured. In my opinion the term of office of Senator is too long. Yet it is a mistake to make terms of office too short. These conclusions are reached from observations in my own State.

Massachusetts had for a good many years annual elections of its governor and other State officers. We recently changed to biennial elections. The fact that the legislation of Massachusetts is perhaps more advanced than that of any other State in the Union along educational and public health lines and improved conditions of the working class is due primarily and chiefly to the frequent elections that have been the constitutional requirement in that State.

As a matter of fact, perhaps, they have been too frequent. A one-year term of office is probably too short, and therefore the people of the State rendered a wise decision in changing the term to one of two years.

This question—and I regret to have to differ with the Senator from Georgia upon this matter—presents this proposition: Upon what theory should terms of office be fixed in a Government like ours? Shall it be upon the theory that good and capable men should be kept as long as possible in office or upon the theory that an unsatisfactory and unfaithful public servant should be gotten out of office as quickly as possible?

Most public officers are good men, are honest men, are capable men, and we have a right to assume that all or practically all of our Presidents are to be good and capable men, and possibly should enjoy the privilege of a six-year term of office; but an unfaithful public servant, a tyrant, a martinet, an autocrat, an intolerant man in the Presidency for six years can wreak havoc to our Government and greatly lessen the confidence of the people in their Government. Let us avoid this possibility. Four years is too long for a weak, totally incompetent, or unfaithful President. In fixing a term of office for a public official such as the President we ought not to make it too long. I would not make it any shorter than four years, but I certainly would not increase the period of time beyond the present term of four years.

There is another point I desire to emphasize. This is, as has been so frequently said a "government of, by, and for the people." It is getting to be more and more a government of the people; and the principle in the fundamental law that makes a government more truly of the people is frequent elections.

The condition in the fundamental law that makes the Government more nearly for the people is in frequent elections. If we are to adhere to the policy and principle of having this Government be in fact a government of the people, let us give them an opportunity to elect their public officials frequently.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. I have always entertained the view which the Senator now expresses with reference to this proposed amendment, but there is one feature of it which I confess has in late years shaken me a little, and upon which I should like to hear the Senator's views.

It is not an unusual thing when a man is elected President for him to devote a large portion of his first term to seeing that he is elected the second time, and in my opinion it leads to many things which are the very worst things which could happen in American politics. That is one feature of this matter which, as I say, has caused me to reflect considerably upon this question, although when we had this matter up here once before I voted to sustain the position which the Senator is now taking. What would the Senator say on that question?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I experience the very same difficulties to which the Senator from Idaho has given utterance. It is regrettable that Presidents recently have appeared to devote much of their energy and effort during the first term of their office to seeking reelection. I am convinced that the very best politics any public man can play, the very best result he can get from even himself as well as for his own constituency, is to do his duty as he sees it, to do it fearlessly, to render conscientious, not political, public service; and it is my solemn conviction that when that kind of service is rendered, though you may not be able to get the necessary votes to reelect men to public office, it does bring a measure of self-respect even from one's fellow men, that is greater than success. Playing the game of politics very often succeeds in the case of smaller offices in bringing about reelection; but when it comes to offices of the magnitude of President and Senator, I doubt if those methods are always successful. I admit such methods seem to succeed in many instances, but they do not bring with success the general respect of their fellow men.

On the other hand, I know the Senator from Idaho will agree that there is another type that might appear in public life, even in the Presidency, if the Constitution provided that there could not be a reelection to public office, namely, the type of man who, once obtaining power, exercises it without prudence, in utter disregard of preelection pledges, and in disregard of the wishes of his own party leaders and of the political platform on which he was elected and of the traditions of the office. We have occasionally seen such types here in the Senate. That type of man can do a great deal of harm, can do as much, if not more, harm than the man who is playing politics with the idea of reelection. It is a question of the lesser of two evils. There may be as much harm and as much danger in preventing a public official from seeking reelection as there is in permitting him to do so; and, further, under our present system it is not impossible for a President to seek a third term, or at least during his second term to have before him the possibility of some time being called back to the public service, and that is a good deterrent influence. It tends so strongly to prevent him from separating himself from his party promises and from the views of his party advisers that he usually proceeds cautiously.

I do not know whether I have satisfactorily answered the Senator or not, but my conviction is a reasonably short term with opportunity for reelection is preferable to a long term without reelection.

There is another reason for frequent elections: The economic and the social and the political questions of to-day are changing with tremendous rapidity. The predominant issue of to-day may disappear in six months and another leading issue may take its place; and yet, if we change the term of office of the President of the United States from four to six years, it is possible that within one year after his induction into office an all-absorbing issue may arise in this country where the President takes a position diametrically opposed or indifferent to the majority opinion in the country. He may leave the people for five years voiceless and impotent because no election can be held.

Next to vox Dei, vox populi is a pretty good and safe phrase and rule for a Government to abide with. It is a mistake to deny the people their rights to speak frequently and directly about their Government and its policies. The importance of many questions is such that there ought to be an opportunity by an election to the Presidency of a reference of the questions to the people of the country. This can be done in part through our congressional election, but it can not be done so effectively and so well as in a presidential election.

The changes that have been made in the municipal governments throughout the country from two-year terms to four-year terms without the right of reelection have not been satisfactory. The result has not tended to make the city government better.

That change has not resulted in more efficient public service, and I still believe that the wisest and safest course for us to pursue is to give the people reasonably frequent elections—not too frequent, but reasonably frequent elections—an opportunity to express themselves on the great issues of the day, and, above all, an opportunity to rid themselves easily of an unfaithful, derelict public servant. That is the supreme end that ought to be considered in fixing the term of office of any public man. No faithful servant should fear frequent elections. If he is a good man and an able man, he can go out of the public service and earn more money than in the public service. It is only the weakling, it is only the indifferent, it is only the negligent, it is only the unfaithful public servant who needs to fear frequent elections. Not the individual but the public welfare should be considered, and surely the best interests of government lie in the power to speedily remove incompetent, unfaithful servants rather than the power to retain faithful ones.

For these reasons I hope the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia will not prevail. It is a move toward reaction and away from progressivism in government.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, if the Senators have made up their minds how they are going to vote on this question, having studied it for years, there is nothing I could say that would change them. I differ with the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH]. I believe that two-thirds of the President's time the first term he is in office is given to politics and to efforts to reelect himself and his party.

I believe the business interests of the country are interfered with by having frequent elections for President. I do not believe we are going to elect a bad man President of the United States. I have faith in the American people and I believe that they will elect good men. The President's duty is greater than that of any other man in the world. I believe that if he used his position for the good of his country, instead of for building up himself and his party, it would be better for the country, and I believe a provision for a six-year term and making him ineligible for reelection would make the President devote almost his entire time to serving the country's interests and not to playing politics, as nearly all of them do.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I want to say just a word. I voted for this proposition when it was before the Senate on a previous occasion and I have not seen any reason to change my mind, but I do not think it advisable to complicate the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska with this amendment, about which there is considerable controversy. Therefore, for that reason and that reason alone, I shall vote against the adoption of the amendment of the Senator from Georgia as an amendment to this joint resolution.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, in my judgment four years is too long a term for a poor President and not long enough for a good President. Under the present system we can give a good President two terms or eight years, and that is not too long. It seems to me our system is infinitely better as it is. I am satisfied with it and expect to vote to keep it as it is.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I am put in an embarrassing position by the offering of this amendment. I am rather inclined to think that the proposition made in this amendment, offered by the Senator from Georgia, if standing alone, would receive my vote. I would not promise definitely; I think I have an open mind on it, but I am inclined to think it would be a good thing. But I do not want to couple up that amendment with the one that is pending.

I am sorry the Senator from Georgia has offered the amendment. There is very little opposition to the amendment fixing a time for the beginning and the ending of the terms of President, Vice President, and Members of Congress, which would, in effect, abolish the short session of Congress, and put a new Congress to work soon after they were elected. There is some opposition even to that, I concede, and I am not criticizing that opposition; it is perfectly legitimate. I think, however, it is in a very small minority. In my judgment the people in this country are anxious to have a new Congress, fresh from the people, installed in office just as soon as that can be done. I think every State in the Union provides for the swearing in of the members of the legislature within a couple of months after their election. I believe that every civilized nation in the world provides for the assembling of their parliament or congress, whatever they may call it, much sooner than our Congress would assemble even under this amendment, and I believe that our country stands alone in all civilization with a provision that prohibits men just elected from the people, to carry out their will, as it is supposed, from going into office for 13 months after they have been elected. While technically they go into office on the 4th of March after their election, in reality it is 13 months afterwards.

I believe the people of the country are anxious to get away from that condition. I am satisfied that practically all of the Members of the House and the Senate who have had experience in legislation are anxious to do away with the evils which come from short sessions. There are many. They can not be enumerated.

It is a thing which permits all sorts of jokers to get into legislation, not necessarily because of dishonesty or lack of ability or statesmanship, but on account of the lack of time to give proper consideration to the things which must come before Congress.

That being the case, Mr. President, I do not want to have coupled up with this amendment something which is going to bring on almost endless debate and discussion, and which of itself carries with it a lot of doubt, the question as to whether the President should serve a term of six years or four years, and, if six, be disqualified for reelection. That is a question upon which the people are probably nearly equally divided. That may not be the case, but at least there is great difference of opinion on the question, and it will bring on discussion and debate, not only here but throughout the country, and may be the means of killing this amendment if it is submitted to the State legislatures.

I do not want to be put in the attitude of fighting this amendment, but I do not want to have coupled to something that is absolutely sure of ratification by the States something which will make it doubtful, and carry down to defeat, perhaps, the real thing we are trying to enact.

Therefore, Mr. President, I hope the Senate will vote down the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia, because I think it seriously endangers the approval of this amendment by the legislatures of the several States. In my judgment, the amendment provided in my joint resolution will have no opposition to speak of if it is once submitted to the States for ratification.

Mr. NORRIS subsequently said:

Mr. President, when I was addressing the Senate on the proposed constitutional amendment I intended to ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD as a part of my remarks a certain part of the report. I make request now that the indicated portions of the report be printed in the RECORD, together with my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

The resolution proposes to amend the Constitution of the United States by fixing the beginning of the terms of President and Vice President at noon on the third Monday in January and the terms of Senators and Representatives at noon on the first Monday in January following their election in the preceding November. Under existing conditions a new Congress does not actually convene in regular session until a year and one month after its Members have been elected. When our Constitution was adopted there was some reason for such a long intervention of time between the election and the actual commencement of work by the new Congress. We had neither railroads nor telegraphic communication connecting the various States and communities of the country. Under present conditions, however, the result of elections is known all over the country within a few hours after the polls close, and the Capital City is within a few days' travel of the remotest portions of the country.

Originally, Senators were elected by the legislatures, and as a rule the legislatures of the various States did not convene until after the beginning of the new year, and it was difficult and sometimes impossible for Senators to be elected until February or March. Since the adoption of the seventeenth amendment to the Constitution, however, Senators have been elected by the people at the same election at which Members of the House are elected. There is no reason, therefore, why the Congress elected in November should not be sworn in and actually enter upon the duties of office at least as soon as the beginning of the new year following their election.

The only direct opportunity that the citizens of the country have to express their ideas and their wishes in regard to national legislation is the expression of their will through the election of their representatives at the general election in November. During the campaign that precedes this election the great questions demanding attention at the hands of the new Congress are discussed at length before the people and throughout the country, and it is only fair to presume that the Members of Congress chosen at that election fairly represent the ideas of a majority of the people of the country as to what legislation is desirable. In a Government "by the people" the wishes of a majority should be crystallized into legislation as soon as possible after these wishes have been made known. These mandates should be obeyed within a reasonable time.

Under existing conditions, however, more than a year elapses before the will of the people expressed at the election can be put into statutory law. This condition of affairs is not only unfair to the citizenship at large, who have expressed their will as to what legislation they desire, but it is likewise unfair to their servants whom they have elected to carry out this will. It is true that it is within the power of the President to call an extraordinary session of Congress at an earlier date than the one provided by law, but the new Congress can not be called into extraordinary session until after the 4th of March, which would not give the new Congress very much time for the consideration of important national questions before the summer heat in the Capital City makes even existence difficult and good work almost impossible. It is conceded by all that the best time for legislatures to do good work is during the winter months. Practically all the States of the Union recognize this fact and provide for the meeting of their legislatures near the 1st of January. Moreover, the wishes of the country having been expressed at an election should not be dependent for their carrying out upon the will of the President alone. Provision should be made by law so that the new Congress could begin the performance of its important duties as soon after election as possible and under conditions that are most favorable for good work. Under existing conditions a Member of the House of Representatives does not get started in his work until the time has arrived for renominations in his district. He has accomplished nothing and has not had an opportunity to accomplish anything because Congress has not been in session. He has made no record upon which to go before his people for election. It is unfair both to him and to the people of his district.

In case of a contest over a seat in the House of Representatives, history has shown that the term of office has practically expired before the House is able to settle the question as to who is entitled to the contested seat. During all this time the occupant of the seat has been drawing the salary and if it is decided in the end that the occupant was wrongfully seated, then the entire salary must again be paid to the person who has been unjustly deprived of his seat. Double pay is therefore drawn from the Treasury of the United States and the people of the district have not been represented by the Member whom they selected for that purpose. No reason has been given why a new Congress elected at a general election to translate into law the wishes of the people should not be installed into office practically as soon as the results of the election can be determined.

Another effect of the amendment would be to abolish the so-called "short session of Congress." If the terms of Members of Congress begin and end in January instead of on the 4th of March as heretofore, and Congress convenes in January, there would be no such thing as a short session of Congress. Every other year, under our Constitution, the terms of Members of the House and one-third of the Members of the Senate expire on the 4th day of March. The session begins on the first Monday in December and because of the expiration of such terms, it necessarily follows that the session must end not later than the 4th of March. Experience has shown that this brings about a very undesirable legislative condition. It is a physical impossibility during such a short session for Congress to give attention to much general legislation, for the reason that it requires practically all of the time to dispose of the regular appropriation bills. The result is a congested calendar both in the House and the Senate. It is known in advance that Congress can give attention to but a very small portion of the bills reported from the committees. The result is a congested condition that brings about either no legislation or illy considered legislation. In the closing days of such a session bad laws get through and good laws are defeated on account of this condition and the want of time to give proper consideration to anything, and the result is dissatisfaction not only on the part of Members of Congress but on the part of the people generally. Jokers sometimes get on the statutes because Members do not have an opportunity for the want of time to give them proper consideration. Mistakes of a serious nature creep into all kinds of statutes which often nullify the real intent of the lawmakers, and the result is disappointment throughout the country. Such a congested condition in the National Legislature can not bring about good results. However diligent and industrious Members of Congress may be, it is a physical impossibility for them to do good work. Moreover, it enables a few Members of Congress to arbitrarily prevent the passage of laws simply by the consumption of time. In every way it brings about an undesirable legislative condition, and it is not surprising that results are so often disappointing.

There is another very important reason why this change should be made. Under the Constitution as it now stands, if it should happen that in the general election in November in presidential years no candidate for President had received a majority of all the electoral votes, the election of a President would then be thrown into the House of Representatives and the membership of that House of Representatives called upon to elect a President would be the old Congress and not the new one just elected by the people. It might easily happen that the Members of the House of Representatives, upon whom devolved the solemn duty of electing a Chief Magistrate for four years, had themselves been repudiated at the election that had just occurred, and the country would be confronted with the fact that a repudiated House, defeated by the people themselves at the general election, would still have the power to elect a President who would be in control of the country for the next four years. It is quite apparent that such a power ought not to exist, and that the people having expressed themselves at the ballot box should, through the Representatives then selected, be able to select the President for the ensuing term. If the amendment we have proposed is adopted and becomes a part of the Constitution, such a condition could not happen, and in such a case the new House of Representatives fresh from the people would be the one upon which would devolve the power to select the new President.

Section 3 of the proposed amendment gives Congress the power to provide by law who shall act as President in a case where the election of a President has been thrown into the House of Representatives and the House had failed to elect a President and the Senate has likewise failed to elect a Vice President. The importance of this can be understood when we realize that under the present Constitution if the election of President and Vice President should be thrown into Congress on account of a failure of the Electoral College to elect, and that the House should fail within the time specified in the Constitution to elect a President, and the Senate should likewise fail during such time to elect a Vice President, the country would be left entirely without a Chief Magistrate and without any means of selecting one. This condition has, it is true, never happened in the history of the country, and while it may never happen, it does seem very important that some constitutional provision be enacted by which this most dangerous emergency may be avoided. The present Constitution gives power to Congress to provide who shall act as President when there is a vacancy both in the President's office and the Vice President's office caused by death, removal, or resignation, but there is no provision in the present Constitution that gives to Congress or any other authority the power to select an acting President in cases where the election has been thrown into the House of Representatives and where the House of Representatives has failed to elect a President, and the Senate has failed likewise to elect a Vice President. If such a contingency should occur, and it is liable to occur after any presidential election, the country would find itself in a condition where it would be impossible for a Chief Magistrate to be selected. The committee has corrected this defect by giving to Congress in section 3 of the proposed amendment the authority to select the acting President in such an emergency.

The question is sometimes asked, Why is an amendment to the Constitution necessary to bring about this desirable change? The Constitution does not provide the date when the terms of Senators and Representatives shall begin. It does fix the term of Senators at six years and of Members of the House of Representatives at two years. The commencement of the term of the first President and Vice President and of Senators and Representatives composing the First Congress was fixed by an act of Congress adopted September 13, 1788, and that act provided "that the first Wednesday in March next be the time for commencing proceedings under the Constitution." It happened that the first Wednesday in March was the 4th day of March, and hence the terms of the President and Vice President and Members of Congress begin on the 4th day of March. Since the Constitution provides that the terms of Senators shall be six years and the term of Members of the House of Representatives two years, it follows that this change can not be made without changing the terms of office of Senators and Representatives, which would in effect be a change of the Constitution. By another act (the act of March 1, 1792) Congress provided that the terms of President and Vice President should commence on the 4th day of March after their election. It seems clear, therefore, that an amendment to the Constitution is necessary to give relief from existing conditions.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JONES of Washington in the chair). The question is upon agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARRIS].

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I have told several Senators that in my judgment there would be no vote this evening because of debate that was going on; and I hope that neither this amendment nor the joint resolution itself will be crowded to a vote, because I know at least one or two Senators who want to speak upon it—one in opposition, who said he could not finish this evening, anyway. He had an appointment at 4 o'clock and had to leave. So I consented that I would not crowd anything to a vote this evening.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. If the Senator is about to move an adjournment, will he permit me to read a telegram into the RECORD?

Mr. NORRIS. Certainly.

MUSCLE SHOALS.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I want to read the following telegram from Nashville, Tenn., addressed to me:

NASHVILLE, TENN., March 12, 1924.

Hon. K. D. McKELLAR,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Count of total and final vote in Banner's referendum on shoals proposition give Ford 56,145. Associated power companies, 49. Government ownership 16. Equal to 864 to 1 for Ford. Approximately 20,000 came from Nashville and Davidson County. Thirty thousand from other Tennessee counties. Remainder from north Alabama and southwestern Kentucky. There was never a fairer vote cast in Tennessee. Every ballot had printed on it "for" or "against" proposition, requiring names of voters. Everybody was urged to vote, and the vote as cast was honestly counted. May we not ask that you use your best endeavor to secure early action by the Senate on House bill.

E. B. STAHLMAN.

At a future time I hope to have the pleasure of addressing the Senate on this subject, but I merely wanted to read this telegram into the RECORD for the information of the Senate, to show how the people of Tennessee feel on this proposition.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, I want to ask the Senator a question. Who is conducting this referendum down there?

Mr. McKELLAR. It is the Nashville Banner, the largest afternoon paper in that city, and perhaps in the State, a most reputable paper, conducted by one of the ablest and strongest men in the State.

Mr. BROOKHART. What is the total number of voters in the State?

Mr. McKELLAR. Probably over 400,000.

Mr. BROOKHART. How many of them are voting for this proposition?

Mr. McKELLAR. More than 56,000 for the proposition and 49, all told, against it.

Mr. BROOKHART. Only a small proportion, really, of the voters of Tennessee voted at all.

Mr. McKELLAR. They only voted to the extent I have indicated.

Mr. BROOKHART. I believe that if those voters knew how the figures of this Ford proposition are juggled in the majority report made in favor of the bill they would all vote the other way.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Ford proposition has been before those people for nearly a year. I do not suppose any people in the world ever studied a proposition more critically than they have studied that. It has been a subject of newspaper controversy and political controversy, and men have taken various sides with reference to the matter. I do not suppose any public proposition has ever been studied to any greater extent than the Ford proposition has been studied by the people of Tennessee, and they are almost unanimously in favor of the Ford proposition, unless they belong to one of the companies, or in some way are interested in one of the power companies which wants to get the power for itself.

Unless they belong to one of the companies or in some way are interested in one of the power companies that wants to get the power for itself, practically the entire population, male and female, white and colored, all are in favor of the proposition in Tennessee.

Mr. BROOKHART. Has there not been an enormous amount of money spent on propaganda in this matter?

Mr. McKELLAR. So far as I know, not a dollar in that State—that is, on the side of the Ford proposition. There may have been. I am not advised, but, so far as I know, there has been none at all.

Mr. BROOKHART. I have some information that there has been a good deal spent around Washington, and I wondered if there had been the same situation down there.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator must have been reading my lobby article that was published in the New York Times.

Mr. NORRIS. I think the Senator probably made a mistake. He meant he heard of a good deal of lobbying around Detroit.

Mr. McKELLAR. I do not know how that is, but if the Senator has any proof about lobbying I hope he will submit it to the Senate.

Mr. NORRIS. The announcement was made that it resulted in a prominent candidate withdrawing from the presidential race and announcing that he was going to support another man in another party.

Mr. McKELLAR. I do not know how that is, but if the Senator from Nebraska or the Senator from Iowa has any information in reference to lobbying either for or against the Ford proposition, I think it ought to be given to the Senate and to the country, because I am afraid that we are letting too many lobbyists exist without knowing that they are here.

Mr. BROOKHART. I wish to say to the Senator that I shall ask the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry to investigate the lobbying on this proposition.

Mr. McKELLAR. I hope the Senator will do so, because I feel that it ought to be investigated if it is being done in the way the Senator suggests.

CHANGE OF DATE OF INAUGURATION—ORDER FOR A RECESS.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, the Senator from Nebraska has notified the Senate that he will not ask a vote until to-morrow on the constitutional amendment——

Mr. NORRIS. If the Senator from Georgia will permit me, I ask unanimous consent that the joint resolution, which is the unfinished business, be temporarily laid aside.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nebraska asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate concludes its business to-day it takes a recess until 12 o'clock to-morrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

EXPERIMENT IN RURAL POSTAL SERVICE.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, a few days ago the Senate was considering the bill (S. 2111) authorizing the Postmaster General to conduct an experiment in the Rural Mail Service, and for other purposes. At the hour of 2 o'clock consideration of the bill had not been completed. I ask that the Senate now resume the consideration of that bill.

Mr. ROBINSON. Does the Senator make the motion or ask unanimous consent?

Mr. HARRIS. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate resume the consideration of Senate bill 2111.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Georgia asks unanimous consent for the further consideration of Senate bill 2111. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed consideration of the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads with an amendment, on page 2, line 13, to strike out the words "appropriation for Rural Delivery Service, and" and insert in lieu thereof "postal revenues," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That during the 12 months next succeeding the approval of this act, the Postmaster General be, and he is hereby, authorized to conduct experiments in the operation of not more than 50 rural routes, in localities to be selected by him; said experiments shall be designed primarily to develop and to encourage the transportation of food products directly from producers to consumers or vendors, and, if the Postmaster General shall deem it necessary or advisable during the progress of said experiments, he is hereby authorized, in his discretion, on such number or all of said routes as he may desire, to reduce to such an extent as he may deem advisable the rate of postage on food products mailed directly on such routes for delivery at the post offices from which such routes start, and to allow the rural carriers thereon a commission on the postage so received at such rate as the Postmaster General may prescribe, which commission shall be in addition to the carriers' regular salaries. The amounts due the carriers for commissions shall be determined under rules and regulations to be prescribed by the Postmaster General, and when so determined and properly certified to the Comptroller General shall be payable monthly by warrant directly from the postal revenues: Provided, That the amount so paid shall in no case exceed the actual amount of revenue derived from this experimental service.

A report on the progress of this experiment shall be made to Congress at the next regular session.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, on Tuesday last the bill was discussed for some time. It has been recommended by the Postmaster General and there was a unanimous report from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads. I believe that it will be a great help to the farmers in the sale of their products, as well as to the town and city people in the convenience and promptness with which they get those products. There will be also the added feature of probable lower prices because of their ability to dispose of the products directly from the producer to the consumer.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

AMENDMENT OF PENSION ACT OF SEPTEMBER 22, 1922.

Mr. BURSUM. I desire to ask unanimous consent to take up a bill which is on the calendar and which was passed over to-day. I was not present when the calendar was called. The bill simply affects the title to pensions for widows. There was evidently a mistake when the law was enacted, and it ought to be corrected.

Mr. ROBINSON. What is the calendar number?

Mr. BURSUM. Calendar No. 130, Senate bill 2154.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. ROBINSON. Pending the request, I would like to have the Senator who makes it explain the purpose and effect of the bill.

Mr. BURSUM. The only effect is to vest title in the widows of veterans. As the law now stands, there is no authority for pensions to be granted to the widows of veterans. This was evidently a mistake at the time the law was enacted taking away jurisdiction from the Veterans' Bureau and transferring it to the Pension Bureau.

Mr. McKELLAR. Will it add to the pension rolls?

Mr. BURSUM. No. There are three applications now. It was merely a mistake at the time the law was enacted. It is necessary to correct the law of 1922 in order to grant the widows pensions. At present they have no title.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator has not made clear why that is true.

Mr. BURSUM. I could read the request of the Secretary of the Interior on the matter. It is quite lengthy, however.

Mr. ROBINSON. Is it recommended by the Interior Department?

Mr. BURSUM. Yes; on the 17th of January, as follows:

I inclose a draft of a proposed bill to amend the act of September 22, 1922 (42 Stat. L. 1038). Its object is to extend the application of the pension laws to the widows, minor children, and other dependents of persons admitted into the Army and Navy on or after February 9, 1922.

Under the present law, in making the transfer, the title was extended to the veterans, but not to the widows of veterans.

Mr. ROBINSON. If that is the correct construction of the law, manifestly the bill which the Senator has asked the Senate to consider ought to be passed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 2154) to amend the act of September 22, 1922, entitled "An act to provide for the applicability of the pension laws to certain classes of persons in the military and naval services not entitled to the benefits of article 3 of the war risk insurance act as amended," which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act of September 22, 1922 (42 Stat., p. 1038), is hereby amended to read as follows:

"That section 312 of the war risk insurance act, as amended by section 17 of the act of June 25, 1918 (40 Stat., p. 613) shall not be construed as making the pension laws inapplicable to persons admitted into the military or naval service after six months from the passage of the act of August 9, 1921, establishing the Veterans' Bureau and adding section 315 to the war risk insurance act, or to the widows of such persons, their minor children, or dependent relatives.

"SEC. 2. All properly executed applications for pension heretofore filed in the Bureau of Pensions by persons affected by the terms of this act shall be accepted as sufficient."

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

THE CALENDAR.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that we proceed with the calendar for half an hour, commencing where we left off this afternoon, and consider unobjected bills only.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas asks unanimous consent that the Senate proceed with unobjected bills on the calendar, commencing with Calendar No. 221. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

ADDITIONAL CLERKS FOR SENATORS.

The resolution (S. Res. 161) providing for additional clerks for Senators not chairmen of committees during the Sixty-eighth Congress was announced as first in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That will be passed over.

JAMES MORAN.

The bill (S. 589) for the relief of James Moran was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and was read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of the pension laws and the laws conferring rights and privileges upon honorably discharged soldiers, James Moran, late corporal in the One hundred and ninth Company, United States Coast Artillery Corps, shall be held and considered to have been honorably discharged from the military service of the United States as a member of Company A, Ninth Regiment United States Infantry: Provided, That no back pay, bounty, or other emoluments shall accrue prior to the passage of this act.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RELIEF OF SUFFERERS IN NEW MEXICO.

The bill (S. 349) for the relief of sufferers in New Mexico from the flood due to the overflow of the Rio Grande and its tributaries was announced as next in order.

Mr. McKELLAR. Is the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. JONES] here to explain the bill?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That Senator does not seem to be present.

Mr. McKELLAR. I suggest that the bill go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

CONVEYANCE OF GOVERNMENT-OWNED ROADS TO NATIONAL CEMETERIES AND MILITARY PARKS.

The bill (S. 2745) to authorize the Secretary of War to convey to the States in which located Government owned or controlled approach roads to national cemeteries and national military parks, and for other purposes, was considered as in Committee of the Whole and was read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he hereby is, authorized in his discretion, subject to such conditions as may seem to him proper, to convey by proper quitclaim deed to any State, county, municipality, or proper agency thereof, in which the same is located, all the right, title, and interest of the United States in and to any Government owned or controlled approach road to any national cemetery or national military park: Provided, That prior to the delivery of any conveyance under this act the State, county, or municipality to which the conveyance herein authorized is to be made shall notify the Secretary of War in writing of its willingness to accept and maintain the road or roads included in such conveyance: Provided further, That upon the execution and delivery of any conveyance herein authorized the jurisdiction of the United States of America, which has been heretofore ceded to the United States by a State over the roads conveyed, shall thereby cease and determine and shall thereafter vest and be in the particular State in which such roads are located.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RECOVERY OF ALLOTMENTS PAID TO DESIGNATED BENEFICIARIES.

The bill (S. 2746) regulating the recovery of allotments and allowances heretofore paid to designated beneficiaries was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and was read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That so much of section 210 of the war risk insurance act, as amended by the act of August 9, 1921 (42 Stat., p. 153), as precludes the recovery of an award of allotment or allowance, or both, paid to or on behalf of a person designated as beneficiary of an allotment under the war risk insurance act prior to August 9, 1921, shall hereafter be applicable to allotments paid prior to August 9, 1921, to beneficiaries designated under the Army allotment system by any person who served in the Army.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I think the bill ought to be explained. I do not understand what it is intended to accomplish.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The report of the committee accompanying the bill explains the matter pretty thoroughly. I think it is best for me to read portions of it for that purpose:

Under the act of March 2, 1899 (30 Stat. 981) as amended by the act of March 2, 1901 (31 Stat. 896), and further amended by the act of October 6, 1917 (40 Stat. 384), officers and enlisted men of the Army on active duty and permanent civilian employees of the War Department on duty outside the continental limits of the United States were permitted to make allotments during the period of the World War for the support of their wives, children, or dependent relatives, or for any other purpose except that of obtaining an advance on their pay. These latter allotments were designated as class E allotments.

Under the law the disbursing officer who in good faith paid allotments to the designated allottees is not held responsible for overpayments resulting from lack of notice of discontinuance of allotments or by the failure to make deductions covering same on pay rolls or pay vouchers. However, this does not relieve the War Department from the duty of collecting erroneous payments and efforts have been and are still being made to recover said overpayments from the allottees by writing letters explaining the circumstances under which overpayments occurred and requesting refundment by certified check, bank draft, or money order. The general plea of the allottee is that the allotment received was accepted in good faith, has long since been spent, and that the allottee is unable to make refundment, although he or she might do so at some later date when his or her pecuniary condition will so permit. In many cases dependents and allottees are making refundments at as low a rate as $1 per month, they not being able to pay more.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, it appears from the statement which the Senator is making that the bill would cover a large number of small amounts paid to different persons which those allottees are not in a position to repay. I therefore make no objection to the passage of the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LEASE OF NEW ORLEANS QUARTERMASTER DEPOT UNIT NO. 2.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 72) authorizing the Secretary of War to lease to the New Orleans Association of Commerce, New Orleans Quartermaster Intermediate Depot Unit No. 2, was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and was read, as follows:

Whereas the New Orleans Association of Commerce desires to develop, encourage, and stimulate better trade relations between the United States and foreign countries, particularly the West Indies, Mexico, Central and South America, by the bringing together of producers, buyers, and sellers of all countries on common ground in the city of New Orleans; and

Whereas the New Orleans Association of Commerce is launching plans for a permanent international trade exhibition of the fabricated and raw products of this country, together with a similar display from foreign countries, for the purpose of creating a permanent organization to be located at that port on a nonprofit basis to promote international trade; and

Whereas in launching a project of this kind it is necessary to begin in a small way to be assured of success, and use such housing facilities as are already in existence to save the cost of buildings during the experiment period; and

Whereas the New Orleans Quartermaster Intermediate Depot Unit No. 2, in the city of New Orleans, La., owned by the United States Government, is now vacant and has been vacant for over five years, which depot is well suited for the purpose of such exposition, and which will be improved by said organization at its own expense at a cost of many thousand dollars, all of which will be beneficial to the property; and

Whereas the success of said international trade exposition will encourage the development of property adjacent to said depot, thus greatly enhancing its market value; and

Whereas such an exposition, if successful, will be of incalculable benefit to the foreign commerce of the United States: Therefore be it

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of War is authorized to lease for a period of two years, without consideration or on such terms or conditions as he deems advisable, to the New Orleans Association of Commerce (a nonprofit corporation organized under the laws of Louisiana), its successors and assigns, the New Orleans Quartermaster Intermediate Depot Unit No. 2 for general exhibition purposes in respect of fabricated and raw products of the United States and similar products of foreign countries; but if such corporation, its successors or assigns, shall cease to use and occupy the depot for such purposes the lease shall become null and void.

SEC. 2. That the New Orleans Association of Commerce, under regulations prescribed by the Secretary of War, may, without expense to the United States, make such alterations in respect of such depot as may be necessary for the purposes for which the building is leased, and in so far as may be compatible with the public interest.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator desire that the preamble shall be acted upon?

Mr. ROBINSON. I suggest that the preamable be stricken out.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the preamble will be stricken out.

MRS. JOHN D. HALL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 2187) authorizing the Comptroller General of the United States to consider and settle the claim of Mrs. John D. Hall, widow of the late Col. John D. Hall, United States Army, retired, for personal property destroyed in the earthquake at San Francisco, Calif. It directs the Comptroller General of the United States to consider the claim of Mrs. John D. Hall, widow of the late Col. John D. Hall, United States Army, retired, for value of personal property destroyed in the military service of the United States Army by the earthquake and fire at San Francisco, Calif., on April 18, 1906, under the provisions of the act of Congress approved March 3, 1885, and to make such allowance in settlement therefor as in his judgment may be deemed just and proper.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOHN H. GATTIS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 2481) for the relief of John H. Gattis, which had been reported from the Committee on Claims with amendments, in line 5, after the words "sum of," to strike out "$2,000" and to insert "$200"; and in line 8, after the words "sum of," to strike out "$2,000" and insert "$200," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to John H. Gattis the sum of $200 in full payment for permanent injury caused by a fall from a ladder while working at the Government Printing Office, in the year 1914, and the said sum of $200 is hereby appropriated for such purpose out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ERIE RAILROAD CO.

The bill (S. 935) for the relief of the Erie Railroad Co. was announced as next in order.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I observe that there is involved in this claim the same question which arose under certain claims embraced in bills which were reached on the calendar earlier in the day. The bill provides for submitting the case which it covers to the United States district court and proposes to authorize the court to enter a judgment.

Mr. CURTIS. I suggest that the bill go over.

Mr. ROBINSON. Very well. I think, perhaps, the Senate ought to consider whether it wishes to establish two precedents of that kind.

Mr. CURTIS. If the Senator will yield to me, I desire to say that there are a number of cases of that kind, and I think the Senate ought to determine and act the same upon every one of them. I ask that the bill may go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state that similar bills which came up previously on the calendar went over. This bill being objected to, will go over.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, two bills were reached on the calendar earlier in the day which involved that same question, whether to give the court power to enter judgment——

Mr. ROBINSON. Or whether the court should merely make its findings and report to Congress its findings for further action of Congress.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will go over.

SAN DIEGO CONSOLIDATED GAS & ELECTRIC CO.

The bill (S. 1930) for the relief of the San Diego Consolidated Gas & Electric Co., was announced as next in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. ROBINSON. Just a moment. What is the basis of the claim?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be read for information.

The reading clerk read the bill as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to the San Diego Consolidated Gas & Electric Co., of San Diego, Calif., the sum of $2,632.57, in full satisfaction of all claims of such company against the United States on account of injuries to pole-tower structures and high-tension transmission lines of said company north of San Diego, caused on September 15, 1922, by the collision with such transmission lines of an airplane piloted by Ensign Jack Shafer, deceased, in the course of his regular duties while attached to the naval air station at San Diego, Calif.

Mr. ROBINSON. It appears from an inspection of the report that the collision by an airplane with the wires of the electric company caused considerable damage, and that the Government is responsible for it. I do not see any objection to the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EZRA S. POND.

The bill (S. 1941) for the relief of Ezra S. Pond was announced as next in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. ROBINSON. Just a moment, Mr. President. Is there any Senator present who understands this claim?

Mr. WILLIS. If the Senator from Arkansas will yield to me, I think I can explain it to him in a moment.

Mr. ROBINSON. Very well. I think the Senator ought to explain it.

Mr. WILLIS. This bill is to reimburse the administrator of the estate of Captain Pond. The facts briefly are these, as set forth in a very carefully prepared report of the committee:

Henry Ezra Pond was a captain in an Ohio company; he was on the ship Moldavia, which was sunk by a submarine. He lost all of his effects. As a matter of fact, I do not recall whether there was any loss of life, though I think not. The ship, however, went down with the effects of the officers on board. Subsequently Captain Pond was killed in the World War; consequently, obviously, he could not himself offer any evidence as to the loss of property. The War Department knows, as appears from the report, just what equipment an officer is supposed to have, amounting to over $550. By all the evidence adduced it was made clear that this officer had that complete equipment, which was entirely lost. It was believed that, inasmuch as the officer himself could not testify, that the claim should be allowed.

Mr. ROBINSON. Is the recommendation of the War Department or the Comptroller General favorable to the claim?

Mr. WILLIS. The Comptroller General rejected the claim, I will say to the Senator from Arkansas, on, it seems to me, the highly technical ground, that the officer lost his life and could not present any direct evidence himself as to the loss of the property; yet it was proven that the officer, along with his brother officers, was fully equipped. However, the Comptroller General, as the Senator from Arkansas will see from the report, rejected the claim because of the rather technical objection that the man was dead and could not offer any testimony.

Mr. ROBINSON. The pending bill is for the relief of the estate?

Mr. WILLIS. Yes, sir.

Mr. ROBINSON. Very well.

Mr. FLETCHER. May I ask the Senator from Ohio if there was any evidence to show that any of these officers at all saved their effects? I see the report states that:

In the case now submitted a finding was made by a War Department board of officers that certain specified articles of a total value of $552.51 were lost by the officer in the sinking of the transport.

That looks as though the board of officers found that to be a fact.

Mr. WILLIS. Of course all they could find was the fact as to the value of the equipment which each officer was supposed to have. If the Senator from Florida has the report before him, and if he will turn to the top of page 3, he will find rather an accurate statement of the case.

Mr. FLETCHER. Yes; the report continues:

The claimant had admitted, however, that he had no evidence his son actually lost any property in the sinking of the transport; or, if any was lost, what was its value.

Mr. WILLIS. Let me explain to the Senator from Florida. The reason why he could not offer any evidence was because the one man who would know about that was dead upon the field of battle. Does the Senator from Florida see the point?

Mr. FLETCHER. I understand that. There is no evidence to show that the officer did save any of his effects, I take it?

Mr. WILLIS. Not at all.

Mr. FLETCHER. And the board of officers seemed to have found out, as a matter of fact, that he lost the articles?

Mr. WILLIS. Yes; that was their opinion. If the Senator from Florida will note, in the report on the preceding page, the letter from Dr. Flanagan bears directly upon the subject.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment to strike out line 3, as follows: "That the sum of $552.51 shall be appropriated to reimburse," and in lieu thereof to insert "That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $552.51 to," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $552.51 to Ezra S. Pond, a resident of 655 Pinewood Avenue, Toledo, Ohio, administrator of the estate of his only child, the late Harry S. Pond, captain Company K, Fifty-eighth Infantry, for loss of equipment sustained by the said Harry S. Pond in the sinking of the United States transport Moldavia on May 6, 1918.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WILLIS. In order that the record may be complete, I ask unanimous consent that the report accompanying the bill may be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the report (No. 221) submitted by Mr. STANFIELD on March 10, 1924, was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Report to accompany S. 1941.

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1941) for the relief of Ezra S. Pond, having considered the same, report favorably thereon with the recommendation that the bill do pass with the following amendment: Strike out all of line 3 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $552.51 to."

STATEMENT OF FACTS.

1. The late Henry Ezra Pond, captain of Company K, Fifty-eighth Infantry, was the only child of claimant, Ezra S. Pond, and his wife.

2. Capt. Henry Ezra Pond, late lieutenant Fifty-eighth Infantry, served with his regiment at Camp Green, N. C., to April 24, 1918, temporarily at Camp Mills, Long Island, N. Y., to May, 1918; left United States May 6, 1918, on transport Moldavia for American Expeditionary Forces, France. According to paragraph 2, third indorsement, chief, effects bureau, port of embarkation, Hoboken, N. J., August 11, 1919, it will be noted that the ship on which this officer crossed was sunk by a submarine, and he lost all of his effects.

He died in action overseas October 5, 1918. (Report of Adjutant General to Director of Finance December 26, 1922.)

3. The rules of the War Department required officers to have a complete outfit before embarking.

In a letter from claimant to Senator Willis dated November 26, 1921, he says:

"Every officer that went overseas had a complete outfit or he did not go over. Anyway, my son had his when he came home before going over, so he informed me, and Washington has a record of all officers' outfits. They also know there was no man aboard the Moldavia that saved anything. They had all they could do to save their lives."

A letter written by the son to his father and mother, dated May 26, 1918, only a scrap of which was recovered from an old stove after the boy was killed, reads as follows:

"DEAR MOTHER AND FATHER: I suppose that you received my wire telling of my safe arrival. I am somewhere over here having a much-needed rest. I left Camp Mills shortly after I wrote to you last, and of course could not write after that. You have read of the sinking of the Moldavia, I guess, through the newspapers by this time. Well, I was on that ship. I managed to get out safely with a few clothes on at 3 a. m. That is all that * * * saved the few clothes that * * * everything else * * * very well t * * * and R * * * of * * * we were * * * hit, so I hadn't gone to sleep at all and even had some of my clothes on. I was lying on my bunk in my stateroom and heard the explosion. It was very much muffled, because it was below the water line, and I did not know just what it was, but I jumped out on deck immediately, and the ship listed to the port side and then I knew what had happened. I went back and got my bunkie out. He hadn't even waked up, and thought I was 'kidding' him when I did wake him. Well, when we found that she was going down we got orders from the ship's captain to 'abandon ship' and got into our lifeboats. We were soon picked up by destroyers and taken to a * * *. The old ship went down while * * * in sight and it was * * *. Everything went * * * and everyone * * * killed by the * * * looking * * * happy." * * *

The War Department has supplied a list of articles required and a statement of the average cost at the time the son was ordered overseas and embarked on the ill-fated Moldavia.

The value stated is $552.51.

A letter to Senator WILLIS from Dr. Harold S. Flanagan, D. D. S., of 335 George Street, New Brunswick, N. J., dated December 5, 1922, is as follows:

"MY DEAR SENATOR: I received your letter of the 4th instant relative to Mr. Pond, and will be very glad to supply you with any information you require to help him.

"His son was among 20 officers on the steamship Moldavia. We lost all our personal effects, but were later paid; i. e., those who survived the battles—I think about 14. Mr. Pond's son, Harry, was killed in the Argonne sector, and of course was not present to present a claim when we presented our claims. I might add here that he was a splendid soldier and fine fellow, and I would appreciate your helping his father, who, I believe, needs whatever money he can get quite badly.

"The War Department has published a list of articles which all overseas officers were compelled to have. We were inspected by inspecting officers and checked up on that list. I can take an affidavit that Pond had everything required by an overseas officer, and I see no reason why he should not be paid when we all collected. I think your office can get a copy of that list from the War Department, and if you mail it to me I'll fix the affidavit here in New Brunswick.

"Hoping I can be of some help in the matter, I am,

"Very truly yours,

"H. S. FLANAGAN, D. D. S."

4. The claimant was appointed administrator of the estate of his son, Harry E. Pond, by letters of administration issued by the probate court of Lucas County, Ohio, October 8, 1919.

5. The claimant filed a claim with the War Department of the United States for $552.51 under act of March 4, 1921.

"In full settlement of the claim of Capt. Ezra Harry Pond for property lost in the military service, amount determined and approved by the Secretary of War under authority of the act of March 4, 1921, and decision of the Comptroller General dated September 29, 1921, $552.51."

6. Following are findings and recommendation of the board under date of September 21, 1921:

"1. The attached papers relate to the claim of Harry Ezra Pond, deceased, formerly captain Company K, Fifty-eighth Infantry, for personal property lost in the military service. The board of officers convened in the office of the Chief of Finance has recommended that the heir or heirs of Captain Pond's estate be reimbursed in the amount of $552.51 in full settlement for the loss of his personal belongings sustained as herein described.

"2. This claim is being sent you in accordance with the act of March 4, 1921, as interpreted by the decision of the Comptroller General dated September 29, 1921, providing for a determination of such claims by the Secretary of War, with the recommendation that it be returned to this office approved for payment in the amount of $552.51."

8. The Assistant Secretary of War approved and recommended payment March 2, 1923, as follows:

"It is hereby certified that the articles of property in the items and values as found by the board were reasonable, useful, necessary, and proper for this claimant in the public service in line of duty, in quarters, or in the field, that the loss occurred under the circumstances ascertained and determined by the board, and that none of the items should be replaced in kind from Government property on hand. The value is hereby under the provisions of the act of Congress of March 4, 1921, ascertained and determined in the amount of $552.51, which amount shall be paid by the proper authority and be in full settlement, release, and discharge.

"J. M. WAINWRIGHT,
"Assistant Secretary of War."

9. The Comptroller General of the United States refused payment under date of May 21, 1923, as follows:

"Capt. CARL HALLA,

"Finance Department, Through Office of the Chief of Finance, War Department.

"SIR: There has been received by reference your letter dated March 19, 1923, with attached voucher, requesting decision whether you are authorized under the act of March 4, 1921 (41 Stat. 1436), to make a payment of $552.51 to Ezra S. Pond, administrator of the estate of Harry E. Pond, formerly captain of Company K, Fifty-eighth Infantry, as reimbursement of the value of personal property alleged to have been lost by the officer during May, 1918, in the sinking of the transport Mondavia while en route for duty with the American Expeditionary Forces.

"The act of March 4, 1921 (41 Stat. 1436), provides for the replacement or the recoupment to the owner of the value of private property lost, damaged, or destroyed belonging to officers of the Army, under conditions therein specified, and section 3 thereof reads, in part, as follows:

"'* * * The Secretary of War is authorized and directed to examine into, ascertain, and determine the value of such property lost, destroyed, captured, or abandoned as specified in the foregoing paragraphs, or the amount of damage thereto, as the case may be; and the amount of such value or damage so ascertained and determined shall be paid by disbursing officers of the Army * * *.'

"This enactment contemplates that—

'* * * the award made by a proper board and approved by the Secretary of War shall be the authority for the payment, and the question for the disbursing officer must be whether there has been furnished to him such an approval award accompanied by the evidence on which it is based. I do not consider it either incumbent on the officer or the accounting officers to examine the evidence for the purpose of weighing and determining whether in their judgment the same conclusion would be reached as that of the board and the Secretary of War, but only to see that the claim made and the evidence have relation to each other, and particularly so that there may be no collusion or fraud. The weight or effect to be given the evidence are for the board and the Secretary of War. * * *'

"See letter of September 29, 1921, to the Secretary of War.

"In the case now submitted a finding was made by a War Department board of officers that certain specified articles of a total value of $552.51 were lost by the officer in the sinking of the transport. The claimant had admitted, however, that he had no evidence his son actually lost any property in the sinking of the transport; or, if any was lost, what was its value.

"It is thus not a question of the weight and effect to be given evidence, but the submission to the disbursing officer is without the evidence which the quoted letter of September 29, 1921, shows to be at least a requirement before payment can be made.

"The voucher submitted is returned and you are advised that payment thereof is not authorized.

"Respectfully,

"J. S. MCCARL, Comptroller General."

FINDING.

In the absence of a direct statement by the deceased son and soldier, the evidence submitted by the claimant seems to this committee to be the best evidence available, and sufficient, when coupled with knowledge of existing facts had by the War Department as to equipment required of officers, inspection and checking at time of embarkation, sinking of the transport, and loss of similar equipment by surviving officers, by every rule of evidence, to establish this claim.

ADDITIONAL CLERKS FOR SENATORS.

Mr. PEPPER. I ask unanimous consent that Senate Resolution 161, being Order of Business No. 221, may be taken from the calendar and recommitted to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

Mr. WILLIS. What resolution is that?

Mr. PEPPER. It is the resolution providing additional clerks for Senators who are not chairmen of committees during the Sixty-eighth Congress.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that Senate Resolution 161 may be taken from the calendar and recommitted to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

LEO P. QUINN.

The bill (S. 2764) authorizing the President to order Leo P. Quinn before a retiring board for a rehearing of his case, and upon the findings of such board either confirm his discharge or place him on the retired list with the rank and pay held by him at the time of his discharge, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It authorizes the Secretary of War, under the direction of the President, in his discretion, to order Leo P. Quinn, late major, United States Army, again before a retiring board for the purpose of a new hearing of his case and to inquire into and determine the facts touching the nature and occasion of his disability, and to find and report the cause which, in its judgment, has produced his incapacity, and whether such cause is an incident of the service, according to the statute, and that upon the findings of such board the President is further authorized, in his discretion, either to confirm the order by which the said Leo P. Quinn was discharged, or, in his discretion, to nominate and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint said Leo P. Quinn a major, the grade which he had at the time of his discharge, and to place him on the retired list of the Army; but no pay, bounty, or other allowance during the period between the time that he was discharged and the time of the passage of this act shall become due and payable by virtue of this act.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MICHAEL SWEENEY.

The bill (S. 1011) for the relief of Michael Sweeney was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides that in the administration of the pension laws and the laws conferring rights and privileges upon honorably discharged soldiers, their widows, and dependent relatives, Michael Sweeney, late of Battery C, First Missouri Light Artillery, shall be held and considered to have been honorably discharged from the military service of the United States as a member of that organization; but no pay, bounty, or other emolument shall accrue to the passage of this act.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CHARLES B. STRECKER.

The bill (S. 47) to permit the correction of the general account of Charles B. Strecker, former Assistant Treasurer of the United States, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause and to insert:

That the Secretary of the Treasury and the Comptroller General be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed to credit in the accounts of the Treasurer of the United States the sum of $15,956, now carried in the account of the office of the Assistant Treasurer of the United States at Boston, Mass., and representing a balance due the United States when the subtreasury at Boston was discontinued, October 25, 1920, in the amount of money belonging to the United States while in the custody of said Assistant Treasurer, the loss of said money having occurred through no fault or negligence on the part of said Assistant Treasurer, as set forth in Senate Document No. 400, Sixty-sixth Congress, third session; and for this purpose the sum of $15,956 is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, this bill carries a considerable amount, more than $15,000. I think it ought to be explained how this loss occurred.

Mr. CAPPER. I will say to the Senator from Arkansas that the bill is intended really to straighten out the books of the Treasury Department, and the passage of the bill is suggested by that department. The explanation is found in the letter from the former Assistant Treasurer.

The subtreasury at Boston has been discontinued. During the war the business of that subtreasury was greatly increased and it became necessary to add to the force. It is not charged that any official of the Treasury Department was in any way negligent in his duties or profited in the slightest degree. In the letter of Mr. Strecker, on page 3, will be found a full explanation of the difficulties. I may say that the Senate has twice passed a similar bill without any controversy at all.

Mr. ROBINSON. I do not understand from the statement of the Senator from Kansas how the necessity for legislation arises. Is it claimed that there were mistakes in the account, or is it claimed that a defalcation or a loss occurred? How does it become necessary for the Congress to legislate with respect to the matter?

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, when Mr. Strecker took office there was a deficiency in the account which the Senator from Kansas has just explained. When the office was closed and Mr. Strecker withdrew, the office, as has been stated, having been abolished, the same deficiency was there, and it was charged against him. He was not responsible for it in any way. There were, as a matter of fact, two shortages, one a shortage in currency which had been sent to Washington and the other was the deficit which existed when he took the office over. He was made responsible for it. As I recall the case—I have not looked at the papers since the bill was passed at a previous session—both shortages occurred in connection with the return of currency to the Treasury here.

Mr. ROBINSON. I see on page 2 a statement which appears to be something of an itemized statement of the matter:

Shortage in shipment of unfit currency April, 1918	$2,456
Shortage in gold certificates held in reserve fund found by Treasury's representatives in discontinuing this office Oct. 25, 1920	13,500

Mr. LODGE. That is the statement of Mr. Gilbert, the Acting Secretary, and the Treasury recommended it. One was missing owing to some fault among the subordinate clerks, and the other never was received. The amounts are carried against Mr. Strecker on the books, but he had nothing to do with either loss.

Mr. ROBINSON. I gather from the further reading of the letter which was just quoted—a letter from Mr. Gilbert, dated February 15, 1921—that there was a loss to the Government of this amount.

Mr. LODGE. Oh, yes.

Mr. ROBINSON. But that this officer is not shown or held to be responsible for it.

Mr. LODGE. No; he had no responsibility, really, for either of them. I acted on the matter on the recommendation of the Treasury Department. I drew it up for Mr. Strecker and presented it, and it was sent in by Mr. Gilbert, as the Senator will see, in 1921. He was in nowise responsible. It was a matter of bookkeeping.

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, I call the Senator's attention to this paragraph in the report from the Treasurer on page 4:

I am satisfied that the loss was not due to the dishonesty or negligence of the Assistant Treasurer. The investigation of the Secret Service seems to me to have been quite thorough, and every person connected with the subtreasury at that time who could possibly have been guilty was carefully investigated. All evidence secured was submitted to the United States attorney of that district and by him submitted to the Federal grand jury. This grand jury, after going into the case, did not find evidence sufficient to warrant an indictment.

Mr. ROBINSON. Then the summary of the evidence is that the agents of the Government never ascertained how the shortage arose?

Mr. LODGE. No.

Mr. ROBINSON. But they did find that this officer himself was not responsible for it?

Mr. LODGE. That was exactly it. It came from two administrations, as the Senator knows.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CHARLES S. FRIES.

The bill (S. 196) for the relief of Charles S. Fries was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Charles S. Fries the sum of $1,248, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for injuries received while employed as a decorator in the United States Capitol on October 24, 1911.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JAMES E. FITZGERALD.

The bill (S. 608) for the relief of James E. Fitzgerald was announced as next in order.

Mr. OVERMAN. Let that go over.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator what is the particular objection to the consideration of this bill?

Mr. OVERMAN. I see from the report of the Postmaster General to the committee that he thinks it ought not to pass. That is all I know about it.

Mr. CARAWAY. May I explain to the Senator what the case is?

Mr. OVERMAN. I shall be glad to have the Senator do so.

Mr. CARAWAY. Fitzgerald is a man living down in Cross County, Ark. He was a rural letter carrier. He transported the mail by means of a horse and buggy. Upon coming into the office on a rainy day he was requested by the postmaster to put up the horse and come back and help straighten out his accounts, the returns that he made at the end of his journey as a rural mail carrier. In doing so the horse became frightened at something and ran away and broke the man's leg, and he has been a cripple ever since.

The law with reference to compensating Government employees who are injured in the discharge of duty I think, without question, covered his case. However, the commission found that in putting up his horse he was not in the discharge of his duty, although it was necessary for him to do it, he was directed to do it, and he had to do it before he could finish his report. For that reason they denied to him any compensation.

Mr. OVERMAN. In the Senator's opinion, he was acting in the line of duty then, was he?

Mr. CARAWAY. Oh, absolutely. He was putting away the means of transporting the mail—the thing he had to do.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Postmaster General says:

Inasmuch as the employee was not on duty, I am of the opinion that the department would not be warranted in recommending favorable action by the Committee on Claims with regard to the bill.

Mr. CARAWAY. I do not know what he could have been doing. He carried the mail with a horse and buggy, and when he drove up to the post office it was raining—a bad day—and the postmaster said, "Put up your horse, and then let us straighten out your returns"; and in trying to put his horse in the barn the man was crippled, and the commission said that because he had passed the door of the post office he was not any longer in the discharge of his duty. Of course, there never was any question about it, but the commission having said it, it had to stay with it.

Mr. ROBINSON. Is that the sole ground upon which payment was denied?

Mr. CARAWAY. Absolutely, the only ground on earth.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, it seems that the House report was favorable and the Senate report was favorable.

Mr. CARAWAY. Anybody on earth except the commission would have known what he was doing; but some people, not knowing what a horse is, decided that he was not in the discharge of his duty.

Mr. OVERMAN. In view of the Senator's statement, I withdraw my objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment, on page 1, line 5, before the word "Fitzgerald," to strike out "E." and insert "B.," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the United States Employees' Compensation Commission shall be, and it is hereby, authorized to extend to James B. Fitzgerald, a former employee in the Postal Service, the provisions of an act entitled "An act to provide compensation for employees of the United States suffering injuries while in the performance of their duties, and for other purposes," approved September 7, 1916, compensation hereunder to commence from and after the passage of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill for the relief of James B. Fitzgerald."

RECEIVER OF GULF, FLORIDA & ALABAMA RAILWAY CO.

The bill (S. 828) for the relief of the receiver of the Gulf, Florida & Alabama Railway Co. was announced as next in order.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, this is an important claim. The amount carried is nearly $30,000. I ask the Senator who introduced the bill to make a statement with reference to it.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, the claim arises out of these circumstances:

While the war was on this railroad company built a road from a point in Georgia down to Pensacola. Pensacola was the terminus of it. The naval air station is some 10 or 12 miles farther south, on the bay. This road was in the hands of a receiver. The Secretary of the Navy called on the receiver of this road to extend the road to the naval air station as a war measure. They wanted to get supplies, and so forth, to the naval air station. Complying with that order—the roads were all then in the hands of the Director of Railways, Mr. McAdoo, by the way—the road was extended, and this was the actual cost of the right of way and the construction, outside of and in addition to what they were able to salvage out of it in the way of rails and crossties afterwards. The payment of the claim has been recommended by the Secretary of the Navy and by the department over and over again.

As the report shows, the bill was reported at the last session and passed the Senate at the last session. The letter of the Acting Secretary of the Navy says:

In May, 1918, it was deemed advisable to obtain the extension of the tracks of the Gulf, Florida & Alabama Railway Co. to the naval air station at Pensacola, Fla., and an arrangement was made with the receiver of the road having that end in view.

The right of way was acquired by the receiver and the grading done and the material necessary purchased, but the road had not been finished at the signing of the armistice, with the consequent discontinuance of its construction.

The Acting Secretary of the Navy recites the circumstances, and recommends that the amount be paid.

Again, beginning on page 3 of the report, the Senator will find a statement of facts, going into detail about it. I quote from that statement:

On May 18, 1918, Hon. Franklin D. Roosevelt, Acting Secretary of the Navy, advised Hon. William G. McAdoo, Director General of Railroads, by letter that the Navy Department had requested the Gulf, Florida & Alabama Railway Co. to extend their tracks to the United States naval air station, this being a war necessity, and that in order to secure funds to make the extension it was necessary that the railway property be released from administration control, to the end that the capital issues committee might authorize the issuance of securities to provide for the construction of the extension and the improvement of the railway.

The capital issues committee made a loan on it which had to be returned to them, and the report says that "it was impossible to reclaim the right of way, grading, and certain materials and labor entering into bridge construction"—they had to build a bridge across a bayou—"and which aggregated $27,008.04."

Mr. ROBINSON. Very well.

Mr. FLETCHER. The building of the track was requested by the Navy Department, and an itemized statement of every expenditure in connection with it is attached.

Mr. ROBINSON. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $27,008.04 for the relief of the receiver of the Gulf, Florida & Alabama Railway Co. as full compensation for amounts expended and unreclaimable in connection with the construction of an extension of tracks to the United States naval air station and yard at Pensacola, Fla.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DAMAGES, ETC., INCIDENT TO TRAINING, PRACTICE, OPERATION, OR MAINTENANCE OF THE ARMY.

The bill (S. 2527) for the payment of claims for damages to and loss of private property incident to the training, practice, operation, or maintenance of the Army, was announced as next in order.

Mr. ROBINSON. I think that bill had better go over.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I hope the Senator will withhold his objection for a moment.

Mr. ROBINSON. I will withhold it.

Mr. WARREN. These are claims which arose from the damage done to citizens by the military during the war, where they had troops in various foreign countries, and so forth.

They have all been adjusted by the War Department, but we passed a law requiring every claim above $500 to come through Congress. This bill covers those claims above $500 that have been passed upon and sent to us. We passed a bill on the subject at the last session. It went to the House, was properly indorsed, and reported favorably, but the session was too short to permit of its passage. I trust the Senator will withdraw his objection.

Mr. ROBINSON. In view of the Senator's statement, I have no objection to the consideration of the bill.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to claimants named in this act the several sums appropriated herein, for the payment of claims for damages to and loss of private property incident to the training, practice, operation, or maintenance of the Army, namely:

To Mary Bauman, Lancaster, Calif., $1,048.75; to R. W. Eubanks, Atlanta, Ga., $842.28; to William R. Midgley, Oceanport, N. J., $538; to Standard Shipbuilding Corporation, New York City, $3,921.59; to Lord Dry Dock Corporation, Weehawken, N. J., $1,034.55; to Fred E. Jones, New York City, $13,457.64; to Stephenson & Bills, Lakewood, N. J., $2,211.90; to B. F. Jones estate, Pittsburgh, Pa., $596.06; to W. S. Lloyds (Inc.), New York City, $890.33; to Firemen's Fund Insurance Co., New York City, $890.33; to St. Paul Fire and Marine Insurance Co., New York City, $890.33; to Mrs. W. D. Holman (estate of Moses Samuels), Lakewood, N. J., $13,368.18; to Dominion of Canada, Ottawa, Canada, $1,200; to James R. Sutton, Kempton, Ill., $850; to Arabella D. Huntington, New York City, $524.27; to Porto Rico Coal Co., San Juan, P. R., $1,000; to the New York State Fair Commission, Syracuse, N. Y., $12,098.25; to Riverside Contracting Co., Brooklyn, N. Y., $8,893.01; to Charles Jensen, Omaha, Nebr., $1,038.50; to Cornell Steamboat Co., New York City, $1,235; to Southern Transportation Co., Philadelphia, Pa., $651; to Joe A. Ottman, Mercedes, Tex., $512.20; to Silver Lake Park Co., Atlanta, Ga., $18,000; to Lee C. Davis, Wrightstown, N. J., $1,807.61.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILL PASSED OVER.

The bill (S. 1307) for the relief of Albert Andrews for loss of personal effects while serving with the military forces of the United States, was announced as next in order.

Mr. OVERMAN. I think that bill should go over unless some Senator can explain it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over, under objection.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, do I understand that there is objection?

Mr. OVERMAN. I want to hear the bill explained. I see that the Secretary of War, Mr. Weeks, has really reported against the bill and says that if Congress passes the bill it will be a gift, as the Government is in no way liable for this loss.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, this young man went into the Army with the First Regiment band of North Dakota and was afterwards transferred to another organization. When he left with his company from the camp at Hempstead, N. Y., he sent back to his home at Mayville, N. Dak., a trunk which contained a couple of musical instruments and some of his civilian clothing. When he returned home he found that this trunk never had reached his home. The Adams Express Co., which had taken the trunk, was out of business when he came back. The railroad company would not pay anything, because they were under Government control, and he made application to the War Department, and there was nothing to be gotten there. The same bill was introduced by Senator McCumber at the last session, but for some reason or other it was not reported out of the committee. The young man at the present time is the instructor of the military band of the First Regiment of North Dakota, and I believe he is entitled to this little sum, which represents the personal belongings which were lost to him in this trunk which was shipped back from Hempstead, N. Y., to his home in North Dakota.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. OVERMAN. I object at present. I may look a little bit further into it. From the report it appears that it is not a valid claim.

Mr. FLETCHER. There is one thing about it which I suggest ought to be cleared up a little. The itemized statement seems to put a valuation of $237 on the property. Of course, ordinarily, the Government does not pay interest on these claims.

Mr. FRAZIER. An itemized statement was furnished.

Mr. FLETCHER. Yes; and it figures up $237, whereas the bill provides for the payment of $288.

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, on page 4 there is an itemized statement which figures up $288.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, as objection has been made, can we not go to the next bill? We should like to go as far with the calendar as we can.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made, and the bill will be passed over.

SAMUEL S. WEAVER.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole proceeded to consider the bill (S. 2431) to authorize the Secretary of War to convey to the Commissioners of Lewes certain land in the county of Sussex, State of Delaware, which had been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs, with amendments, on page 1, line 3, to strike out the words "Secretary of War is hereby authorized and directed to convey by quitclaim deed to the commissioners of Lewes" and to insert in lieu thereof the words "United States hereby grants, quitclaims, and reconveys to the State of Delaware"; on page 3, line 10, after the word "less," to strike out the semicolon and the words, "such piece or parcel of land having been conveyed by the United States for its use in the construction of an inland waterway improvement from Rehoboth Bay to the Delaware Bay shore, but having since been found unnecessary for such waterway improvement and abandoned by the United States," so as to make the bill read:

O Lord, our Lord, the blessing and the bounty of another day are with us. May every wholesome cheer make its duties less arduous. Show us how the humblest service becomes the loftiest when inspired by the purest motive. Speak peace to our souls and bid all discord cease. Bless them with the riches of pure thoughts and wholesome deeds. Forgive us when we are selfish; recall us when we go astray, and may we think no ill of others. Be with our President and bless him with the riches of Thy grace and give him great peace. Through Christ. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

ORDER OF BUSINESS FOR MONDAY NEXT.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the business in order on next Monday be made in order on Tuesday.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent that the business in order for next Monday be made in order on next Tuesday. Is there objection?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, that is such an important matter to the entire membership of the House that I feel it should be disposed of with more than a handful of Members present, and I feel constrained to make the point of order that there is no quorum present. I am willing the request should come up after we get an attendance of Members.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. It is clear that there is no quorum present.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

Almon	Bowling	Carew	Cullen

Anthony	Britten	Connolly, Pa.	Davis, Minn.

Hawley	Michaelson	Sears, Fla.
Howard, Nebr.	Miller, Ill.	Steagall

The SPEAKER. Three hundred and thirty Members have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will open the doors.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I renew my request now for unanimous consent that the business in order on Monday be made in order on Tuesday.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent that the business regularly in order on Monday next may be in order on Tuesday instead of Monday. Is there objection?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object——

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I also reserve the right to object.

Mr. SNYDER. I desire to reserve the right to object.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from Ohio if it is the purpose on the next suspension day or the next Consent Calendar day to consider the report of the Ways and Means Committee upon the soldiers' adjusted compensation bill?

Mr. LONGWORTH. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN] can answer that question.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, in answer to the question I will say it is my intention on next suspension day to move to suspend the rules and pass the bill which has been ordered reported, and it is my expectation that I will be recognized by the Speaker.

Mr. SNYDER. The question I want to ask is, What will be the business on Monday next?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Appropriation bills will be in order.

Mr. SNYDER. Then consent day will be set aside.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. In other words, Mr. Speaker, to get directly to the point, this means if the request of the gentleman from Ohio be granted that on Tuesday the House will have under consideration the soldiers' adjusted compensation bill?

Mr. LONGWORTH. That is the understanding.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Speaker, further reserving the right to object, of course that is subject to recognition by the Speaker. I understand the gentleman proposes to make the motion?

The SPEAKER. May the Chair interpolate, the Chair thinks Members of the House have the right to be informed, so far as the Chair can, of the program, and unless something should occur to make the Chair change his mind in the interval, the Chair would expect to recognize the gentleman from Iowa for the purpose he desires.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Speaker, further reserving the right to object, I want to say this: I understand that this unanimous-consent request is made on account of the fact some Members of the House expect to be absent on Monday. There are a number of gentlemen of this House, particularly from our State of Illinois, who are necessarily at home on account of their primary campaign. They could come here by Monday and use Sunday in traveling, and would have an extra day, which would not interfere with their other important work at home. If this is postponed until Tuesday or any other day they will lose valuable time in their primary campaigns. I want to say in addition that I understood this matter would come up on Monday, and it happens that I must be personally present in Chicago to register for my own primary on Tuesday, no other means of registration being afforded, and it will be impossible for me to be here on Tuesday. However, I shall not place any objection upon that personal consideration, but I do want to call attention to the fact that when we undertake to change the regular order of the House, the regular procedure and the regular calendar of the House, while we may be accommodating some people we are doing some injustice to others who have the right to rely upon the rules and the calendar as fixing the procedure of the House.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Yes.

Mr. RANKIN. Does not the gentleman think that just as great an injustice is done to the ex-service men of the country by the Committee on Ways and Means bringing this bill out and asking for a suspension of the rules and passing it without any opportunity for debate or amendment?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. If I thought as the gentleman apparently does, I do not think I would facilitate the matter by consenting to any other procedure than that which is provided by the rules.

Mr. RANKIN. Oh, yes; we might object and move the slaughter up to Monday instead of Tuesday.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, may I ask the majority leader [Mr. LONGWORTH] why it is considered necessary to press this soldiers' bonus legislation under such circumstances as that it will not be open to amendment? What is there about that legislation that makes it improper that the House should have an opportunity to amend it?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I will say to the gentleman that at the last time that the soldiers' compensation was brought up in the House it was done under suspension of the rules.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, may I interpose in this long enough to say that the gentleman is not quite accurate about that? The first time it was before the House it was brought in under suspension of the rules. That was in the Sixty-sixth Congress. It was done in that way at that time, of course, for the same reasons that it is being done now, that it was not desirable to open it up to the House for amendment. The next time it came before the House, in the Sixty-seventh Congress, it came in under a special rule creating a new suspension day, which also cut off all possibility of amendment; and that, of course, was done in that way for the same reason that it is proposed to do it now, that it does not seem to the majority party to be desirable to open the bill up to amendment.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I am sincerely in favor of a cash bonus. I want some opportunity to express my sentiments by a vote. Under the method by which it is proposed to present this measure, no sincere advocates of a cash bonus will be given an opportunity to express their sentiments, and all they get is either to have it rammed down their throats in an objectionable form or else to have to vote against it, and thereby put themselves in the attitude of opposing the bonus.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I do not yield further to the gentleman.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a moment there?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I shall be glad to.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I think I should say that at all times when this bill has come up I have opposed the manner in which it was brought up, both on the original occasion and subsequently, when it came under a special rule creating a new suspension day in order to cut off the possibility of offering amendments.

Mr. LONGWORTH. My recollection is that in the Sixty-seventh Congress it was considered under a motion to suspend, but I am not absolutely certain as to that.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. It was considered under a special rule in the Sixty-seventh Congress, by which a new suspension day was created. In the Sixty-sixth Congress it was considered under a motion to suspend the rules. Both times it was so maneuvered as to prevent the offering of any amendment.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The gentleman may be correct.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. At any rate it has never been considered under conditions that permitted of amendment.

Mr. LONGWORTH. It has not.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. It ought to be considered this time, this one time, under conditions that will permit amendments. [Applause.] But if this request is objected to, and it does not go over until Tuesday, then it will be called up Monday, as I understand it, so that nothing can be gained, so far as I can see, by objection.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The only thing that will happen will be that the gentleman will be sorry on Tuesday instead of on Monday.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman share that grief with me?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I shall not grieve. [Laughter.]

Mr. JEFFERS. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I shall not object, for the reason already stated, but I say that the fact that this has been brought up heretofore under the well-known gag rule is one of the reasons why this House changed the rule.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Speaker, if I can have a moment under the reservation of the right to object, as a member of the Committee on Ways and Means I do not want to object to this unanimous-consent request, but I do want to say one further word. "On page 170 strike out the lines 16, 17, 18, and 19, the proposed beneficiary having died."

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I rise in opposition to the committee amendments. I do so merely for the purpose of calling attention to how important, after all, this particular committee is with reference to its legislation. We are placing a whole lot of confidence in the committee, and I am hopeful that it is not misplaced.

Here is a bill which has 176 pages in it, and every page embraces items to put a man or a woman on the pay roll of the Government to draw a pension for life, and these 176 pages have just been read in this House in exactly six minutes by the watch.

Of course, if the committee has been careful and has seen that every one of these cases toes the mark under the law and comes within the law, then we are perfectly safe in letting these bills be passed in that way. But sometimes I have seen committees of which I am a member take up bills of 150 pages in them and try to report them favorably without reading them in the committee, if you please. If that is the policy of this committee no wonder our pension pay roll has grown until it has reached nearly $300,000,000.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Of course, the gentleman will admit that there is nothing in the framework of this bill except the name of the pensioner and the amount of the pension.

Mr. BLANTON. Yes; but that is the main thing which involves the Treasury and means that an extra name has been put on the pay roll for life at so much per month.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. And that is all we need to know about the bill, is it not?

Mr. BLANTON. That is all we seem to need to know about it, but I want to say this: We are all depending upon the committee to see that the law has been tracked. If they make mistakes we are not in a position to rectify them, because we are depending entirely upon the committee to see that no mistakes are made.

I hope the committee has been careful in framing such bills, because we let them go through here every once in a while without ever reading them. I hope the committee is careful; I hope the committee has let nobody put anything over on it, and I hope they go into each individual case specifically before cases are put into these omnibus bills of 176 pages which the committee brings in and which we pass in five minutes' time.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. The gentleman is well informed about documents filed in the House, and he knows that the report contains a full statement as to every case.

Mr. BLANTON. I am using this time to let the committee know we are relying upon it in bringing in these bills and we are expecting them to know all about every individual case, and that each case is fully authorized by law, before they put them in these omnibus bills.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. And I want the country to know that every case has received thorough consideration.

Mr. FULLER. Mr. Speaker, in answer to what the gentleman says, I can assure him and the House that every one of these cases has been very carefully investigated and I think they are all meritorious. They are not all new cases, but most of them are cases of increase of pension for those already on the roll.

I have asked the clerk of the committee to prepare a general statement concerning this bill, which is a very large bill, with an estimate of the cost, and so forth, and I ask unanimous consent to incorporate that statement in the RECORD at this point.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by inserting a statement. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The statement referred to follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
COMMITTEE ON INVALID PENSIONS,
Washington, February 16, 1924.

Hon. CHARLES E. FULLER,
Chairman Committee on Invalid Pensions,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR CHAIRMAN: The following data is furnished in response to your request for certain information about H. R. 6941, the omnibus bill recently reported by you from the Committee on Invalid Pensions:

The bill contained, when reported, a total of 949 private or special bills, introduced by 229 different Members of the House.

The proposed beneficiaries in the bill are principally widows and helpless sons or daughters of Civil War soldiers. Widows who married soldiers after June 27, 1905, number 422; widows increased to $40 and $50 because of physical disabilities and indigent circumstances number 285; helpless sons or daughters of soldiers pensioned at $20 a month or increased from their present rate of $12 to $20 number 177. These three classes of claimants account for 884 of the 949 cases. Only 55 soldiers would be placed on the pension roll if the bill becomes a law. These soldiers have been denied pension because of some technicality in service record or because their service was a few days short of the required 90 days. In practically every case they are in destitute circumstances and handicapped by old age and other disabilities.

If all of the proposed beneficiaries should live one year from date of approval of bill, the total cost in pensions would be $292,104 for the 12-month period. But as a large majority of the claimants in the bill are very old, some even in the nineties, and most of them in a bad way physically, it is reasonable to presume that a high death rate may be expected. Probably 20 per cent will have passed away by the end of one year. Since the bill was introduced a few days ago word has been received of the death of four of the claimants. Based on a death rate of only 15 per cent, the cost for the next year would be $248,288.40.

As you know, the committee is functioning under very strict rules, and recommends favorable consideration only in cases of meritorious character. About 600 of the 949 bills were passed by the House and favorably reported by the Senate Committee on Pensions in the fourth session of the Sixty-seventh Congress, failing to pass in the Senate because of the jam of business at the close of the session. These 600 cases, it might be proper to add, represented the work of the entire session. Claimants in numerous other cases, which were passed at the same time last Congress, are now deceased.

The attached list, containing the names of 229 Members of the House who have special bills in O. B. H. R. 6941, shows that the proposed beneficiaries live in all parts of the United States—north, south, east, and west.

Cordially yours,

FRANK T. MORAN,
Clerk Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Mr. FULLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert at this point a short statement as to the cost of this bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by inserting a statement as to the cost of this bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The statement referred to follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
COMMITTEE ON INVALID PENSIONS,
Washington, March 13, 1924.

Hon. CHARLES E. FULLER,
Chairman, Committee on Invalid Pensions,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR CHAIRMAN: Complying with your request, I have completed figures showing the total amount in additional pensions provided by the committee omnibus bill, H. R. 7816, as follows:

Total yearly cost of additional pensions----------	$73,656.00
Less reduction on death rate of 15 per cent----------	11,048.40
Net additional cost for next year----------	62,607.60

As the great majority of proposed beneficiaries are extremely aged and practically helpless, the death rate may exceed 15 per cent.

Very truly yours,

FRANK T. MORAN, Clerk.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. FULLER, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed, was laid on the table.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 6426) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy, and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War, and to widows of such soldiers and sailors.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky calls up the bill H. R. 6426, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. Has the gentleman been authorized by his committee to call up this bill?

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Yes; I am the ranking member, and the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. KNUTSON], the chairman, asked me to call it up.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point that only the chairman of the committee can call the bill up unless another member has been specially authorized by the committee; and until that special authorization is shown, I submit that only the chairman may call up the bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not hear the answer of the gentleman from Kentucky. Was he authorized by the committee?

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman is merely the ranking member.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. KNUTSON] has not been able to be in charge of the committee and I have been the acting chairman, and he and the members of the committee have asked me to bring it up.

Mr. BLANTON. I make the point of order, Mr. Speaker, that until the ranking member has been specially authorized by his committee he has no authority to call up the bill.

Mr. DOWELL. Where does the gentleman find that rule?

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

FIRST DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL, FISCAL YEAR 1924.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent, before we go into Committee of the Whole, that the general debate on H. R. 7449 be limited to three additional hours, to be controlled by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] and myself. I have used one hour more than the gentleman from Tennessee and out of the three hours, of course, the gentleman from Tennessee would be entitled to two hours.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that general debate on the pending appropriation bill be limited to three hours, two hours to be controlled by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] and one hour by himself. Is there objection?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I am not going to object, because the gentleman has been exceedingly kind and generous, not only in connection with this bill but previous bills, as to distribution of time. I have requests that would probably take about three hours, but I know the gentleman is very anxious to get along with the bill and I want to help him.

Mr. MADDEN. As a matter of fact, what we ought to do is to move to close debate.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I want to ask the gentleman this question. I understand another appropriation bill will follow this one?

Mr. MADDEN. There will be another one on Monday, assuming we are going to finish this bill to-morrow or to-night. I would like to stay here and finish it to-night.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I hope we can get through to-night.

Mr. MADDEN. All right; there will be another one to-morrow in that case.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 7449) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in certain appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1924, and prior fiscal years, to provide supplemental appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1924, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 7449.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 7449, with Mr. LEHLBACH in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the title of the bill.

The Clerk reported the title of the bill.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman five minutes.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, the brave ex-service men of this country are to have their rights in this House assassinated next Tuesday. Arrangements have already been made to hand them a lemon. I do not believe that there are 5 per cent of the ex-service men of this country who want the kind of bill that has been reported by the Committee on Ways and Means. It is called an adjusted compensation bill, yet merely grants them an insurance policy, and they either have to live 20 years more or die to get it. These men in the trenches of France risked their lives once for the Government and now ought not to have to die to get their adjusted compensation.

I want to warn the new Members of this House just what it means to call a bill up in the House next Tuesday under suspension of the rules, as the Republican leaders have already arranged to do with the ex-service men's bill. In the first place, the reported bill provides only for an insurance policy; there will be only 40 minutes of debate in the second place, which affords no reasonable time for discussion, and in the third place, you can not amend it in any particular, you can not change the dotting of an "i" or the crossing of a "t," but you must vote for that insurance policy bill and nothing else, just as the bill is written now, for under a suspension of the rules you can not change the bill in any particular. That is not all. Those who are to call this bill up know that under that kind of an arrangement it takes a two-thirds vote to pass the bill. That bill could be voted for by an overwhelming majority of this House and yet lack one vote of having the necessary two-thirds and the bill would fail. The steering committee well knows that we know also that if we vote against that kind of an arrangement and vote against their bill for an insurance policy we will be placed in the attitude of voting against the soldiers' compensation bill. That is the worst feature about it.

I want to say this to my colleagues: Every true friend of the ex-service men in this House ought to stand up here shoulder to shoulder next Tuesday, like a solid phalanx, and vote against that insurance bill and vote it down, because the ex-service men do not want it. Then we will force the Committee on Ways and Means to bring in a proper adjusted compensation bill for the ex-service men, such as they want. But you say you do not want to be placed in the attitude of voting against the ex-service men. You say you do not want to be misconstrued, you do not want the newspapers to misinterpret your action. You need not be afraid. You can not fool the ex-service men.

They know what they want, and they know that insurance bill is not what they want, and if you will help vote down that proposition next Tuesday and not pass the insurance measure you will force the Ways and Means Committee to bring out a proper adjusted compensation bill for them.

Yesterday I stood here on this floor and voted against the so-called prohibition enforcement bill, for I considered it a waste of millions that will produce no results of value, and I am as strong a prohibitionist as there is in this House. I hated to have to stand up with such wet friends as our distinguished colleague from Maryland [Mr. HILL] and my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. GALLIVAN], but I do not believe that bill which we passed is going to stop the smuggling of liquor. It is a wasteful piecemeal kind of proposition that will amount to nothing. We had a chance to pass a proper measure and we did not do it.

Mr. WOLFF. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. WOLFF. Regarding the prohibition bill, the gentleman must acknowledge that most of them do not want the smuggling stopped.

Mr. BLANTON. Well, it looked that way, by bringing up that kind of a measure.

Mr. HILL of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I have only five minutes, but I yield.

Mr. HILL of Maryland. Just one word. I only want to say to the gentleman that if he can get the bill which he introduced before a committee I shall appear for it. I am with the gentleman for honest law enforcement.

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, the gentleman would make me suspicious of my own measure if he voted for it. [Laughter.]

Why is it that we will sit here like a bunch of mocking birds and let a committee continually cram something down our throats that we do not want? If we want a certain kind of measure why do we not stand up here like men and demand it and see that that kind of a measure is brought in here and passed? Why do we continually accept some subterfuge? I have been here seven years. I have seen this modus operandi carried on here for seven years. I have seen bills brought in here that did not embrace what the Members wanted, and I have had to vote for them, and other Members have had to accept them because we have not made a determined stand and demanded what we want, but I think the time has come when the membership ought to force committees to bring in the kind of bill the Members want and pass it. [Applause.]

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. CELLER].

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend and revise my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, on March 1 last the distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CABLE] made a very serious charge in this House that there existed here what he called a foreign bloc, in opposition, as he stated, to the passage or the progress of the so-called restricted immigration bill, H. R. 6540. I have been interested in the subject of immigration and the subject matter of that bill ever since the hearings were conducted last Christmas week. I know, however, that there is no such thing in this House as a foreign bloc. To my mind that charge is just as unsubstantial as a mirage; it is just as false as a dicer's oath; and I think that the distinguished gentleman from Ohio was in error.

I had something to do with the authorship of a statement that was signed by all but two of the Democratic Members of the New York delegation, a statement which was in protest against certain provisions of that bill. I assure you, my good friends, that the gentlemen who signed that protest are not foreign and they have no foreign proclivities whatsoever. They are thoroughgoing Americans and to classify the men from my State who were signatory to that protest as members of a foreign bloc I think is going a little too far. Probably overwhelmed by protests coming from all over the country this form of attack is used as a pretense for argument.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CELLER. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. SNYDER. I just want to say in furtherance of the statement of what the gentleman's delegation did in signing the protest, that about two weeks before that the solid Republican New York delegation of this House in caucus or conference agreed upon the same thing.

Mr. CELLER. I congratulate the gentleman and I congratulate the gentleman's conferees.

Mr. SNYDER. One can hardly say that that was a foreign bloc.

Mr. CELLER. From his remarks, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CABLE] would probably include the gentlemen who were in that Republican conference as well as the gentlemen who were signatory to the statement to which I referred, as members of the foreign bloc. I wonder in what category the gentleman from Ohio would place the distinguished Secretary of State, Mr. Hughes, who has likewise voiced sentiments in opposition to the bill?

Where would he place former Attorney General Wickersham, and I wonder, indeed, where he would place the great number of churches which have been on record as opposed to the discriminatory features of this particular bill. I read a number of these great religious organizations which have put themselves in no uncertain fashion against the discriminatory terms of this bill:

The Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America, the Methodist Church, the Presbyterian Board of Missions, the National Lutheran Council, the Home Missions Council, the Baptist Board of Home Missions, the National Congregational Council, the Presbyterian Board of Home Missions, the International Young Men's Christian Association, the Young Women's Christian Association, the Council of Women for Home Missions, the Travelers' Aid Society, the Immigrant Publication Society, the Near East Relief, the New York City Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church, the Committee of Reference and Counsel, the Foreign Mission Conference of North America, the National Council of the Protestant Episcopal Church, the World Alliance for International Friendship Through the Churches, the Catholic Welfare Conference, the American Jewish Conference, and the National Council of Jewish Women.

Many other prominent organizations have swelled the chorus of objection, among them are:

The National Industrial Conference Board, American Bankers' Association, and Association of Manufacturers of the United States.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CELLER. Not at this time. I want to develop my thought.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. The gentleman does not want to make an incorrect statement.

Mr. CELLER. No, indeed; I do not.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I just wanted to say the gentleman is incorrect.

Mr. CELLER. I decline to yield to the gentleman from Washington. These various denominational welfare, industrial, and mercantile societies and a great many men prominent not only in their own community, but throughout the country, have voiced sentiments against this bill. And why? If you will examine closely and carefully its terms, you will find that the quota from Austria is reduced by 84 per cent; that the quota from Czechoslovakia is reduced 85 per cent; that the quota from Greece is reduced 93 per cent; that the quota from Austria, 88 per cent; that the quota from Italy, 90 per cent; and from Lithuania, 93 per cent; Poland, 66 per cent; Russia, 90 per cent; and Yugoslavia 85 per cent.

Mr. WATKINS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CELLER. Not at this time. It is quite natural that those of foreign origin in this country become aroused when they examine the quotas from their native countries and find they have been thus unjustly reduced. I would say they were spineless and unworthy of remaining here if they would not enter a protest against these discriminatory and un-American features. To accuse all those good Americans and true of this House, who in their wisdom sincerely see no merit whatsoever in the quota provisions of the bill, of being a foreign bloc is unworthy of the learned gentleman from Ohio. I call upon him in all candor and honor to withdraw the charge.

Mr. CABLE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CELLER. For one question.

Mr. CABLE. I simply want to repeat and reiterate the statement that the foreign governments and nationals in this country have no right to dictate to the National Congress or our people what laws we should pass in respect to immigration.

Mr. CELLER. Correct. I agree most emphatically with the gentleman that they have no right to dictate our policies. We are the sole judges and arbiters of our policies, but I think they have a right—as Japan, for example, has a perfect right—to point out if it might, in its judgment and wisdom, where we might be in error in reference to a policy we seek to adopt, because, after all, we can not erect around this country a Chinese wall and endeavor to exclude nations from across the waters from discussing these matters. We might as well try to keep out the Atlantic Ocean with a groan. It can not be done, and you will find public opinion, even from foreign lands, seeping right into our midst. They should not dictate our policies, but you can not keep out books or magazines or keep out documents which might be effective even in this country for molding public opinion; and, vice versa, what we think of the policies of foreign countries will be also effective within the geographical areas of those countries.

Mr. CABLE. If the gentleman will yield for a question. Does the gentleman think that Japan should limit her protest in the diplomatic manner customary of countries on such questions and not threaten to cancel millions of dollars of contracts they have in the United States?

Mr. CELLER. I think the gentleman from Ohio is extravagant in his claims. I do not believe that Japan has threatened such action. I will say this, that in seeking to cancel the gentleman's agreement with Japan the Immigration Committee has set in motion processes that disturb our friendly relations and has already kindled in the hearts of the Japanese emotions that will threaten the breakdown of the disarmament treaty.

Mr. WATKINS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CELLER. I can not yield. I do not want to be or appear to be rude or discourteous; my time is short.

It is the most vaunted purpose of the majority of the Immigration Committee to encourage assimilation, yet this bill has already done more than anything I know of to bring about discord among our resident aliens. Processes have been encouraged that make for the very antithesis of assimilation. The Italian is told he is not wanted; the Pole is confronted with the stigma of inferiority; the bar sinister is placed upon the Czech and the Russian. Fortunate is the one whose cradle was rocked in Germany or England. The "inferior complex" is now extended to all Europe, save Nordics. The Austrian rubbing elbows with the Norwegian in the subway or on the street is beset with emotions of inferiority. His pride surges within him. He resents the stigma placed upon him. Surely he does not view the favored one with complacency. Does he not rather view him with hatred? Thanks to the ill-considered and improvident Johnson bill; and so race is set against race, class against class.

So the very segregation and clannishness of races sought to be scotched is encouraged. It is passing strange that the Immigration Committee appointed in 1907, and which spent several years on the question, never in its many volumes of reports even suggested discriminatory quotas based upon the census of any year.

Furthermore, this bill and the pseudo-scientific propaganda for it has unleashed the dogs of religious and racial hatred. If proof were lacking as to this, one need only read the testimony of witnesses that appeared before the Immigration Committee.

The war and the present postwar period, both redolent with hysteria, offer the worst possible background for reasoning out the immigration problem. As a result of the ordeal of the war we are still hysterical about immigration. The ultra restrictionist and those behind the Johnson bill claim we are a disunited people. Nothing is further from the truth. The war proved that of all nations in the combat we were the most united. We were successful in welding our many peoples without the use of force or coercion. The methods embodied in the Johnson bill are the forceful methods used by Germany to assimilate her people. We know what ill success attended upon Germany's efforts. It is almost inconceivable that we should be adopting the futile German method.

I am indeed in favor of restriction but not restriction run riot. Let us retain the present law temporarily. Let us appoint an immigration commission (see my bill H. J. Res. 122) to determine and report concerning the complexities of this most intricate problem before we pass a law which shall embody our permanent policy. Then, after a reasonable time, with the hysteria of the war and its aftermath far behind us, we can deliberate this vexatious problem calmly and dispassionately.

I have here, gentlemen, for the information of the House in the short space of time allowed to me, some charts which I desire to exhibit and explain. I do not know whether the gentlemen can very well see the charts. They have been prepared after a great many months of care, and I very carefully and with infinite care myself compared the figures, which in the main have been taken from the records of the United States Census Bureau, with the figures on these charts, and I have found, so far as I could learn, no error.

Mr. HERSEY. Will the gentleman yield? Did the gentleman make these charts?

Mr. CELLER. No; they were made by the National Industrial Conference Board, under the supervision of one Mr. Lutz.

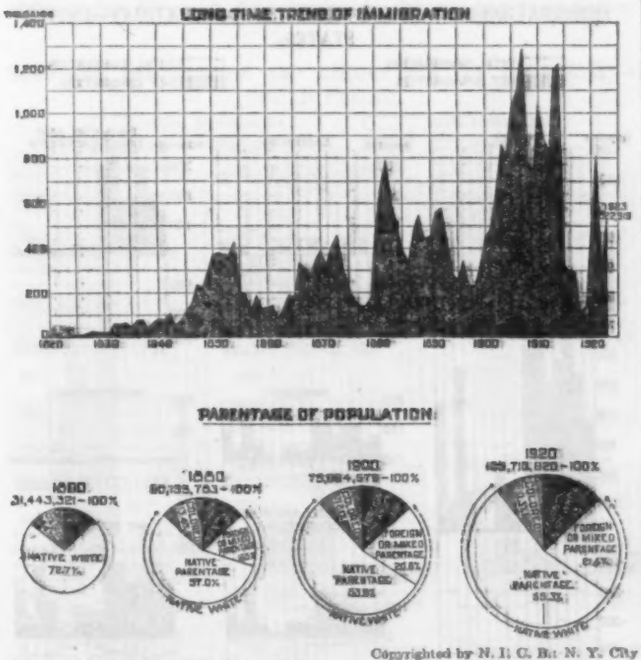
Mr. HERSEY. And is not the work of Government officials?

Mr. CELLER. They are not official charts; but, as I have said before, they are charts which, according to my knowledge, on examination, and having before me the immigration and census figures, I found correct, and that the figures on these charts and the plotted lines are substantially accurate. Now, if you will examine the trend of immigration through the history of immigration you will find that immigration moves in cycles; that it corresponds with business depression or business prosperity. In other words, the law of supply and demand obtains in immigration as it obtains in almost everything else, immigration being more or less an economic problem.

Chart 1 plots an immigration line from 1820 to the end of the fiscal year 1922; that is, July 1, 1923.

This chart shows the general increase in immigration as well as its cyclical movements, which correspond closely to the cyclical movement of business. The panic years—1837, 1873, 1884, 1893, 1907—were each followed by a marked decline in immigration. On the other hand, immigration has been greatly stimulated during periods of business prosperity in the United States. In response to the demand for labor in the period of canal development in the twenties and of railroad building in the thirties of the nineteenth century immigration increased from a level of about 10,000 to over 70,000 per year. The opening of the West with its accompanying opportunities attracted a large number of immigrants from Europe after 1880, when the intensive development of the manufacturing industries of the United States greatly increased the demand for labor and a further augmentation of the number of aliens arriving took place.

This movement of immigrants was further intensified in the first 10 years of the present century. The war period brought with it a sharp falling off in immigration, but by 1920-21 a tendency was shown to approach the pre-war volume. The per cent limit act of May, 1921, restricting immigration from European countries to 3 per cent of the total number of foreign born from each country resident in the United States, as shown by the census of 1910, and supplementing the restriction of previous laws, resulted in a decrease of the total immigration in the fiscal year ending June 30, 1922, to a number somewhat below the total immigration in 1850.



The lower diagram in this chart shows the assimilation of the immigrants into the population. It shows that in spite of the increasing and irregular flow of immigration the proportion of foreign born in the whole population has been practically constant, hovering around 13 per cent of the total population.

This is also true of the native born of foreign parentage. Thus if in 1860, 1880, 1900, and 1920 the proportion of our foreign-born whites was always around 13 per cent, where is the immigration peril we hear so much about?

Reverting to the upper part of the chart, I desire to point out more in detail the relationship between immigration and business conditions during the period from 1900 to 1923. It shows how immigration was checked by the depression in 1900 and 1901, rose rapidly during 1902 and 1903, decreased in 1904, rose again in 1905, 1906, and 1907, fell greatly in 1908, and did not recover in 1909; rose in 1910, fell in 1911–12; and rose again to a very high point in 1913–14. During the war period, of course, there was relatively little immigration, but in 1919–20 immigration was again approaching its pre-war level. The great falling off in immigration in 1921–22 was due to business depression as well as the operation of the per cent limit act, as is shown by the fact that in the next year more than 50 per cent more people entered, even though the same law was in operation.

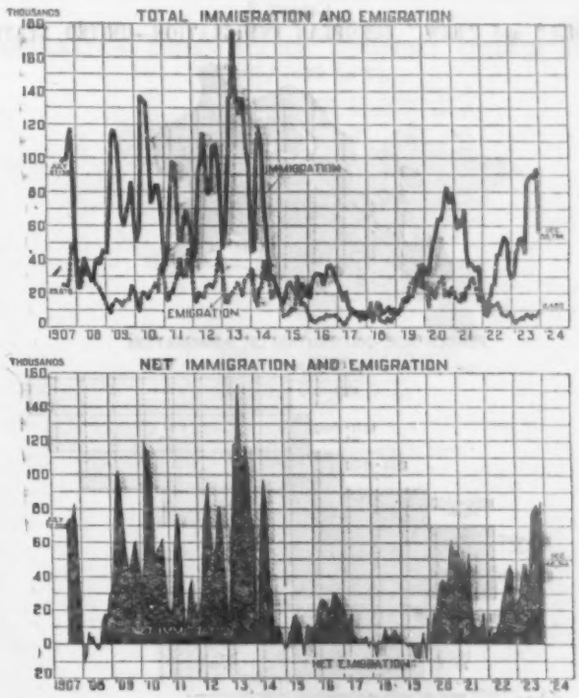
Emigration is not affected by business conditions as definitely as is immigration. This is probably due to two facts—(1) business conditions in Europe are liable to be the same as in this country so that nothing would be gained by returning there in the period of business depression, and (2) people probably do not leave this country for the same economic reasons that they came. They probably return largely for sentimental reasons, so that their time of going would not be so definitely affected by business conditions. It is interesting to note from this chart how emigration fell off during the war, contrary to the usual impression that many aliens went home to fight.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. CELLER. I regret I can not yield. I do not mean to be discourteous to the gentleman. I will yield after I have exhausted all but 10 minutes of my time.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. If the immigration has been 13 per cent, why do you complain when we propose to make it 16 per cent?

Mr. CELLER. There has never been a phantom of an immigration peril in this country at any time, because our foreign population, as I say, was never more than 13 per cent, either in 1860, or in 1880, or in 1900, or in 1910, or in 1920, and very likely it never will be, no matter what our immigration policy may be, above the percentage of 13.



In addition to the cyclical movement, both immigration and emigration show a regular seasonal movement. Each year in the pre-war period, whether immigration is small or large, a high point was usually reached in the summer and a low point in December or January. The operation of the per cent limit act, under which immigration is at present regulated, appears to have slightly shifted the seasonal fluctuation. Since the fiscal year runs from July 1, a desire is created to get into the United States before the quotas have been exhausted, whereas normally immigration has been at its height in the spring and warmer weather.

We find upon a close examination of this chart that the emigrant always comes over here when the weather is most beneficial or agreeable to his natural instincts and habits. For example, the Italian comes over here in greatest numbers when the weather is warm.

This probably might show the inadequacy of the new provision of the new law which provides that the immigration period shall be for 10 months instead of 5 months, as at the present time. If the immigrant has a tendency to come over to this country when the weather is warmest—that is, in the spring and summer or early part of the fall—I think we should make every effort to make our law consistent with that desire. However, for economic reasons I understand that the proposal provides that the period shall be extended for a period of 10 months instead of 5, as at present.

The commissioner at Ellis Island claims, for example, that his men are overworked if the inspections are condensed into five months, and for that reason contends that there should be a spreading out as much as possible of immigrants passing through the immigration station at Ellis Island. Now, I have purposely brought here the annual report of the Commissioner of Immigration for the last fiscal year with reference to the revenues obtained in the Immigration Service, and we find a very significant statement therein contained that there is a profit, for example, to the Government every year, through the head tax and fines, of $1,019,236.07.

In other words, of the many departments of our Government, at least there is one department that more than pays its way. I say, therefore, if the question is merely one of economy, if we have this surplus and if we take in more than we expend for immigration, we should not consider, with any degree of weight, the argument of the Commissioner of Immigration at Ellis Island, that if you are going to confine the work to five months you overburden the men. I say that if we have this surplus from immigration we should extend the period over 10 months and employ more immigration inspectors and more immigration employees, because this chart, if anything, shows that the immigrants desire to come into this country only during times when the weather is not inclement.

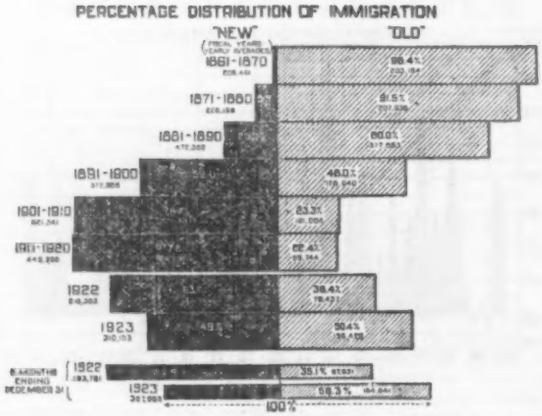
It would be cruel to force people from warm climates to come into the country and through New York Harbor during the bitter winter weather. I therefore maintain that the period of ingress should not be extended over 10 months, but should be left at 5, as at present.

Figures showing the number of immigrants arriving do not indicate the net increase in population due to immigration, since during the time that large numbers of aliens were coming in there was also a steady exodus of emigrants. Because statistics of emigration were not kept before 1908, however, a yearly comparison of immigration and emigration is available only since that date.



Emigration tends to move both cyclically and seasonally in an opposite direction from immigration. It shows a low rate in the spring and a high rate in the last quarter of the year. This seasonal exodus is due to economic influences and closely follows the seasonal fluctuations in industry. Employment in unskilled occupations is at a high level from late spring until early fall, during which period, in addition to factory employment, there are also numerous opportunities for outdoor work on the farms, on roads and public works, and in the building and construction industries. The laborers most affected are the unskilled who are engaged in outdoor work. Like "birds of passage" they leave in large numbers for their native countries on the approach of inclement weather, when they are faced with the prospect of unemployment. This seasonal movement is especially marked in the emigration from the United States to southern and eastern European countries, where winter is the time most favorable for outdoor work.

The diagram shows that in the first few months of this fiscal year immigration has for the first time since 1914 reached its pre-war average. Emigration, on the other hand, exceeded its pre-war average in the years 1919, 1920, and 1921.

The lower diagram shows that in only a few periods since both immigration and emigration statistics have been kept has there been an excess if immigration over emigration, and that these have been relatively slight.

The map in Chart 3 shows the countries of the so-called "old" and "new" immigration. The "old" immigration comprises the following countries of northern and western Europe: United Kingdom, Norway, Sweden, Denmark, France, Germany, Belgium, Holland, and Switzerland. "New" immigration comprises all other countries of Europe. The chart shows the percentage distribution of immigration on this basis. It shows that in the decade from 1860–1870 "new" immigration was only 1.6 per cent of the total, but that by the decade 1890–1900 it had increased to over one-half, and in the last decade, from 1911–1920, it was over three-fourths of our total immigration. The per cent limit act of May 19, 1921, so restricted immigration from these countries that in 1922 the proportion was reduced to about 64 per cent, when practically all of the "new" countries took advantage of their full quota and only part of the "old" countries took advantage of their full allotment. With the "old" countries taking more advantage of their full quota, the situation now has been practically reversed, so that in the six months ending December 31, 1923, the portion of "new" immigration is only about 44 per cent of the total and that of the "old" about 56 per cent of the total.

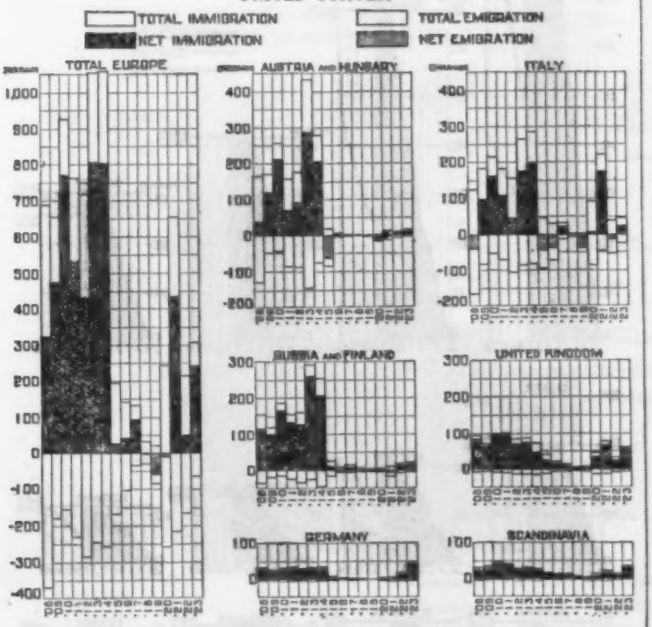
Chart 4 shows total immigration and emigration and net immigration by years since 1908. The occupational classification shown in this chart is based on the statements made by the immigrants themselves when arriving or by the emigrants when departing. It probably in the case of immigrants very fairly represents their previous occupation. Whether or not it represents their occupation after they enter this country is another matter. It is, however, very probable that many of the "farmers and farm laborers" do not become agricultural workers in this country, but go to industrial centers and become laborers in factories or mines, so that if they leave they report themselves as "laborers." This may account for the high net immigration of "laborers," as contrasted with the other occupation groups.

The chart on laborers, however, shows, to a very large degree, a tremendous net immigration which is not wholly explained by the above. It is common experience that our dearth of laborers and our intense need for them has not been remedied by the per cent act, and the condition will be made worse under the Johnson bill, which seeks to keep out in the main the Italians, the Poles, the Serbs, the Czechs, and all the others who do our "bull" work.



The "skilled" group represents only to a slight extent industrial workers. It is composed largely of clerical occupations

Chief industrial occupations represented are tailoring and dressmaking. "Miscellaneous occupations" represent mainly servants, but also include merchants and dealers, agents, teamsters, fishermen, and so forth. The "no occupation" group includes mainly women and children. Many of these, however, although they have no occupation when they arrive, go at once into some remunerative work in this country.

Chart 5 shows immigration and emigration, and net immigration and emigration for all European countries and separately for the main immigrating countries. It shows that there has been an excess of immigration over emigration from Europe as awhole except in three years, 1918, 1919, and 1920. One difficulty with any figures on immigration based on the country of origin of the immigrants is the change in the boundaries of many of these countries in the post-war settlement. In the chart, for those countries where boundaries have been changed, the post-war figures are based on the present territory and are, therefore, not comparable with the earlier figures. Austria and Hungary include only present Austrian and Hungarian territory. Considerable immigration from Yugoslavia Czechoslavia, and Rumania, which were formerly either in whole or in part included in Austria-Hungary, are now shown with "other Europe." The figures for Russia and Finland are reduced chiefly by the exclusion of Poland, which is shown below separately. The chart shows that Italy has the greatest amount of net emigration. Other "new" countries—Austria-Hungary, Spain, Portugal, Greece, Poland, and "other Europe"—likewise show a net emigration in certain years. The "old" emigration countries, on the other hand—United Kingdom, Germany, Scandinavia, France, Belgium, Holland, and Switzerland—show very little emigration and no net immigration at all.

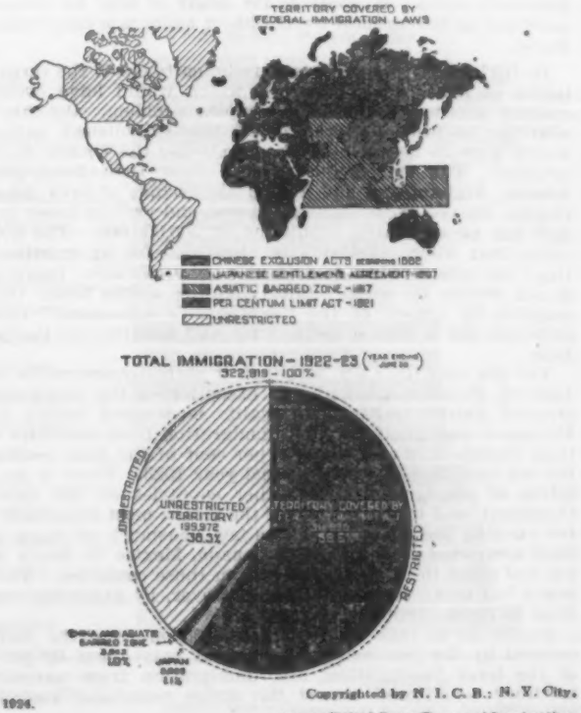
Reverting to the net immigration, for example, of Italy, it has been charged that the Italians come here, get their store of worldly goods, then go out of the country and spend their money, or rather our money, in Italy.

Now, I do not see anything very wrong in that, and why? They built the subways; they did the rough work; they erected our buildings; they did the things which no other races will do. When they go out they probably do take our money, but they do leave the subways and they do leave the buildings. Let us also recognize this fact: I was recently in conversation with New York Supreme Court Justice Cotillo, who made an extensive tour in Italy, and he tells me that the coming of Italians from this country to Italy has awakened a desire among the Italian population for all manner and sorts of American-made goods. There is a vast number of Singer sewing machines, for example, on the other side; phonographs, Ford cars, and all sorts and kinds of automobiles. There is a constant desire on the part of those who have returned to live there in the state and manner in which they lived in this country. If they had automobiles here and sewing machines and phonographs, they want the same mechanisms on the other side, thereby encouraging considerable trade relations between this country and Italy.



When the per centum limit act was passed on May 19, 1921, there already was legislation restricting immigration from certain Asiatic countries.

The following discussion of restriction of Asiatic immigration is from the National Industrial Conference Board Research Report No. 58, page 59.

From the early fifties up to the time of the Supreme Court decision of 1876 the State of California had attempted various methods for limiting Chinese immigration. Congress, however, was interested in suppressing the Chinese slave trade rather than in restricting Chinese immigration to the United States. In 1862 a law was passed to prevent American vessels from engaging in the coolie or slave trade. This was directed especially at such trade between China and the West Indies.

In 1868 the Burlingame treaty, destined for an important rôle in international relations, affirmed the right of voluntary migration of Chinese to the United States, but denied them the right of naturalization. A subsequent treaty with China in 1880 established the right to suspend immigration of Chinese laborers, with certain exceptions, for specified periods of time. The Chinese exclusion laws of 1882 and 1884 definitely fixed the period at 10 years. Their provisions were renewed in 1892 and again in 1904, to remain in force until replaced by other legislation.

By 1906 the question of Japanese immigration had become acute in the Western States, and in that year the demand was made for legislation similar to the Chinese exclusion acts in order to prevent the entrance of Japanese laborers. In the immigration law of 1907 a provision was inserted to the effect that the President might refuse admission to any aliens making use of passports to the insular possessions, the Canal Zone, or any country other than the United States in order to gain admission to continental United States. The President took advantage of this provision and by proclamation excluded—

Japanese or Korean laborers, skilled and unskilled, who have received passports to go to Mexico, Canada, or Hawaii and come therefrom.

By the so-called "gentlemen's agreement" of 1907 between the United States and Japan the two Governments were to cooperate to secure the effective enforcement of this regulation. Japan was to continue her existing policy of discouraging emigration of her nationals and was to issue passports only to nonlaborers or to laborers who were "former residents" of the United States, "parents, wives, or children of residents," and "settled agriculturists."

House bill 6540 seeks to abrogate the "gentlemen's agreement."

Permit me at this point to quote from a leading periodical:

It is certainly both unnecessary and mischievous to meddle with the existing status of Japanese immigration. What is known as the "Japanese question" is almost the most delicate in our entire field of foreign relations, and there is great danger to our peace through foolish jingoism in that regard. The "gentlemen's agreement" has been scrupulously observed by Japan and has admittedly been satisfactory to the United States. By it we actually control both the amount and the kind of Japanese immigration. The National Committee on American Japanese Relations points out that since the inauguration of this policy—from 1909 to 1923—22,737 more Japanese men left the United States (including Hawaii) than entered it; that the net increase by immigration of Japanese into the continental United States during those 15 years was 8,681, consisting of women and children. If there are minor defects in the "gentlemen's agreement," they can easily be remedied by diplomatic action. It would be the height of folly for Congress to overthrow an international treaty without notice to or consultation with Japan.

In 1917 effective measures were taken to check the threatened influx of East Indian laborers, which would have eventually created another serious and complex problem. On this occasion the so-called "barred zone" was established, natives of which were to be excluded from entering the United States as laborers. The zone includes India, Siam, Indo-China, parts of Siberia, Afghanistan, and Arabia, the islands of Java, Sumatra, Ceylon, Borneo, New Guinea, Celebes, and various lesser groups, and has an estimated population of 500,000,000. The act provides that where exclusion is "provided for by existing treaties" the geographical exclusion is not applicable; hence China is not within its scope. Japan likewise comes under this exemption by reason of the "gentlemen's agreement" of 1907, although she is within the latitude and longitude of the barred zone.

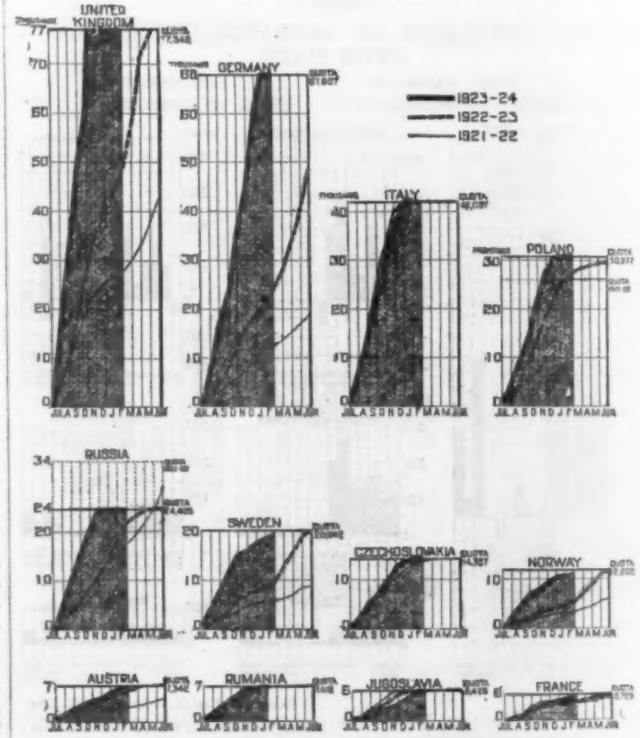
The per cent limit act, although it normally covers the entire Eastern Hemisphere, with the exception of the previously restricted Asiatic territory, in reality is directed mainly at the European immigration. The immigration from countries other than Europe was only about 2 per cent of the total covered by the per cent limit act in the fiscal year 1923. There is no regulation of immigration from other countries on the American Continent, and this gives one of the means most frequently used for evading the operation of the law, inasmuch as many aliens from restricted territory go to Canada, Mexico, or South America and enter the United States from those countries. The proposed bill seeks to remedy this, however, by extending restrictions to those countries.

In the fiscal year 1923 the immigration from the territory covered by the per cent limit act was only about 60 per cent of the total immigration, and immigration from unrestricted territory constituted almost the entire remaining amount, or about 38 per cent of the total.

Chart 7 shows the number of persons who have entered from each of the specified countries during the three years' operation of the per centum limit act. It shows the aggregate number from the first year up to any date. Thus in 1921–22 only 5 of the 12 countries shown filled their quotas. The United Kingdom filled a little more than half of her quota and Germany only about one-fourth of hers. In 1922–23, however, practically all of the countries filled their quotas except Germany, but many of them not until near the end of the year. In the present fiscal year, however, the quotas for all 12 countries shown have already, in a little more than six months, been completely filled.

Now, there again we find something which must be correlated with the economic and political conditions which obtain in the countries of those nationals. We know, for example, that England filled her quota this year and last year, but not the year before. Why? There exists in England at the present time and has for a considerable period a business depression. People are not satisfied with the conditions obtaining in England. There is a labor government there, and there was a tendency for the last two years to see the labor government coming, and there was fear that conditions would not remain constant in industry, with the result that there has been a constant coming over here of Englishmen.

During the first year of operation of the per centum act business and economic conditions were better and there was less unemployment, and that is why the English did not come over here that year. There was no need. There were plenty of jobs there. We know, for example, that at the present time Germany has filled her quota; and why? There has been an utter collapse of the mark, causing all sorts and manner of ramifications in industry to the detriment of industry in Germany, and therefore those who are dissatified in Germany come over here to better themselves.



Now, it does not follow, as day follows night, for example, that there will be "bad times" for all time in England and in Germany during the operation of the per centum act. When better times come, for example, in Germany, nothing will induce the German immigrant to come here. Thus, despite the quota and the "benevolent neutrality" we assume toward Germany, his Nordic lordship may not be enticed to leave his domain on the Rhine.

As to Sweden, there is the same operation of economic law. That country is now suffering from financial troubles—hence the exodus of Swedes to this country. They remained in Sweden during the first year of the per centum act when jobs were plentiful.

Chart 8 shows the foreign-born population of the United States at the various census periods, divided up according to country of birth. These countries have been grouped in the chart and shaded according to classification of "old" and "new" immigration. It shows a corresponding situation by that shown in the immigration figures in chart No. 3. It shows that in 1880 almost three-fourths of the entire foreign white population was from the United Kingdom and Germany, and that only a very small proportion was from the "new" immigration countries. As the immigration from the "new" countries, however, became greater and greater, the proportion of persons of these nationalities in the population steadily increased, until in 1920 this group made up about 46 per cent of the total as contrasted with the countries of "old" immigration which were represented by about only 40 per cent of the total foreign white population.

(While the main point of the chart has been discussed above, it is interesting to note that throughout this whole period the proportion of the foreign white population from countries outside of Europe has remained practically constant.) The function of the chart is to show the importance of the year chosen if the distribution of the foreign population at any period is to be chosen as the basis of immigration selection.

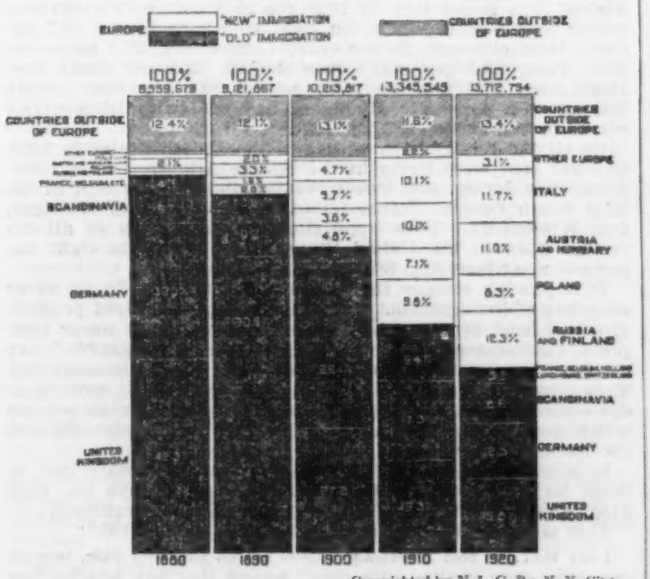
The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. CELLER. I ask for five minutes more.



Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I yield the gentleman five additional minutes.

Mr. CELLER. This is a very interesting chart, showing the proportion of old and new immigration from 1880 to 1920. Let us center our attention on the column 1890. The black represents the proportion of "old" or Nordic immigration. The white represents the "new" or non-Nordic immigration. The portion hatched represents immigrants from countries outside of Europe. The Johnson bill harks back to the census of 1890. Measure with the eye the part of the column that is white. How does it compare with the part of the column that is black? Is it not like a pigmy unto a giant? This graphically discloses the utter discrimination between "old" and "new" immigrants contained in the Johnson bill.

I must remind the distinguished gentlemen of the Immigration Committee of what Bobby Burns once said: "The best-laid schemes o' mice an' men gang aft a-gley."

NATIONALITY OF FOREIGN POPULATION—UNITED STATES.

I see that my time is almost up, and I am very anxious to explain this chart, which is most significant.

It is difficult to lay down a standard of assimilation. When has an alien completely taken on the color of his surroundings? It is, indeed, difficult to say. The processes of so-called Americanization is necessarily imperceptible, like the blending of darkness into dawn or twilight into night. Most people may argue that a rough but clear test is the duration of the alien's residence prior to taking out final naturalization papers; his political renunciation and adoption of the new country is then completed.

John Palmer Gavit, author of Americans by Choice, of the Americanization series, in examining some 26,000 petitions for final naturalization in 28 Federal and State courts in cities scattered all over the country, has put forth some very illuminating statistics concerning naturalization. These statistics—embodied in Chart No. 9—have been approved by the Senate Committee on Immigration, Sixty-eighth Congress, first session. This chart shows that, contrary to the usual opinion, the greatest desire to become naturalized, and thus a great avidity to show civic and political interest is not shown by the nationalities of "old" European immigration—Nordics—but by those of "new" immigration—Alpines, Mediterraneans, and non-Nordics.

It would, indeed, repay one to correlate the above figures with the quotas contained in the Johnson bill. That bill bears most heavily against those nationals who most quickly naturalize, and is most benevolent to those nationals who naturalize least readily.

We find—for example, as to Greece—that the average stay of a Greek in this country before he takes out his final papers is 8.6 years. The average stay of a Russian is 9.6 years; Rumanian, 9.8 years; Hungarian, 9.9 years; Hollander, 10.1 years; Dane, 10.2 years; Austrian, 10.5 years; the Finlands, 10.5 years; Turkey in Europe, 8.1 years; and Turkey in Asia, 8.5 years.

Leaving out Turkey for reasons which I will explain later, we have nine countries whose nationals remain here a period less than the average period, and of those countries we find only three of the so-called older immigrants and six, or twice the number, of the so-called newer immigrants.

Now, what is the situation higher than the 10.6 years? We have nine countries whose nationals remain a longer period than the 10 years, and who are they? We find, for example, that the Scot remains here 10.6 years, the Norwegian 10.8 years, and that the Italian is the only one of the "new" immigration that remains longer than the average period, namely, 11.4 years. The English, German, French, Swiss, Swede, and Canadian remain here longer than 10 years before they take out their naturalization papers, and the Canadian remains here 16 years, and yet we presume in this bill to bend in favor of those who stay here a longer period of time before they show a desire to become a part of our body politic, and bend most heavily against that type and class of immigrants who have been doing the "bull" work of this country and who remain in this country less than the period of 10 years before they take out their naturalization papers, and thus show a greater desire, therefore, and a greater avidity to interest themselves in our politics, in our economics, in our general weal and welfare.

There is a good test. If we want to make a test with reference to assimilation, there is a test which will stand all strain. It is an acid test. We say, for example, that we should take in only those who have a desire to become assimilated in our population. I say that those newer immigrants by taking out their naturalization papers sooner than the old immigrants deserve more beneficent treatment at the hands of the Immigration Committee than they have received in the bill proposed.

Mr. CABLE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CELLER. The Secretary of Labor has stated that he was willing to restrict immigration in proportion to total naturalization; that is, he would take at a given time the total number of our naturalized citizens, discover what proportion of that total number were, for example, English, and then permit that proportion of English nationals to enter the country.

I, for one, would be satisfied to accept naturalization figures, but not naturalization figures based upon the proportionate number of nationals that have naturalized. That would be entirely unfair. For example, about 63 per cent of all the English in this country have become naturalized and almost 73 per cent of all the Germans. They have been here longest and should, indeed, have a larger percentage than that. The Greeks have a low percentage of about 17; the Poles about 28; the Italians little over 28; but they have been here only a short period of time and did not have the golden opportunities that were available to the old immigrants, that is, those from the western and northern parts of Europe, by virtue of their longer stay and their earlier immigration here. No, the only just naturalization test is the duration of their stay before they take out their final papers.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has again expired.

Mr. CELLER. I should be very glad to yield to the gentleman from Ohio if I could get more time.

PARENTAGE OF PERSONS GAINFULLY OCCUPIED (BY OCCUPATIONAL GROUPS)—UNITED STATES: 1920.

N. I. C. B. Wall Chart Service: March, 1924.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. CELLER. Under leave granted to extend my remarks I present Chart 10.

The black portions of the bars, to the left, are those gainfully occupied of native parentage. The hatched portions of the bars are those of foreign or mixed parentage. The white portions of the bars are those foreign born. The black portitons of the bars to the right are those gainfully employed of the Negro race.

Run the eye along the hatched and white portions of the bars and see the industrial or occupational contribution of the foreign white stock in our midst.

The figures shown in Chart 10 are taken from the census of occupations. In some occupations the foreign born are more prominent in America than in others. If the major occupational groups alone are considered it is found that in 1920 white persons of foreign stock, including both foreign and native born of foreign or mixed parentage, outnumbered the native whites of native parentage in the manufacturing and mechanical industries in the ratio of about 5 to 4, in the mining and metalliferous industries in the ratio of about 12 to 11, and in domestic and personal service in the ratio of about 6 to 5. On the other hand, the native whites of native parentage in 1920 outnumbered the whites of foreign stock in the ratio of almost 3 to 1 in agriculture, 6 to 1 in professional occupations, 5 to 4 in clerical occupations, about 5 to 4 in transportation and in public service, and about 10 to 9 in wholesale and retail trade.

In the lower part of the diagram the proportion of the native and foreign born is shown for specified occupations in manufacturing or mechanical industries. It shows the rather obvious fact that the unskilled occupations have a higher proportion of foreign workers and that the more highly skilled occupations are made up chiefly of the native born of native or foreign-born parents.

Anyone familiar with the immigration problem knows that immigrants as a group are faced with the necessity of finding work immediately. They tend to settle in or be drawn to those sections in which the industries are concentrated and in which chances for employment are greatest. The natural preference of immigrants for living among their own kind or for certain occupations has also affected their distribution. The population census of the United States shows that, while in 1920 the foreign-born whites constituted 13 per cent of the total population, they comprised over one-fourth of the population of the New England States, over one-fifth of the population of the Middle Atlantic States, and about one-sixth of that in the East North Central States. Taking the more important industrial States, it is found that in 1920 the ratio of the foreign-born whites to the total population was: In Rhode Island, 28.7 per cent; Massachusetts, 28 per cent; Connecticut, 27.3 per cent; New York, 26.8 per cent; New Jersey, 23.4 per cent; New Hampshire, 20.6 per cent; Minnesota, 20.4 per cent; North Dakota, 20.3 per cent; Michigan, 19.8 per cent; Illinois, 18.6 per cent; Wisconsin, 17.5 per cent.

Of all the foreign-born whites in the United States in 1920, 35.8 per cent were living in the Middle Atlantic States (New York, New Jersey, and Pennsylvania) and 23.5 per cent in the East North Central States (Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Michigan, and Wisconsin). Thus approximately three-fifths of all the foreign born in the United States were located in eight important manufacturing States.

It is passing strange that the above-mentioned States never complain of immigration. They are probably the most progressive and most prosperous of all our States. They never complain, furthermore, that the immigrant is "indigestible," nor do they discriminate between "old" and "new" immigration. They know only too well that the mighty leveler, upward or downward, as the case may be, are their splendid public schools which make thoroughgoing Americans of the immigrants and the immigrants' children.

It is quite fashionable, although erroneous, to state that in these large industrial and immigration centers like the East Side, New York City, for example, radicalism is rampant.

This is what Roosevelt said of the East Side in 1904:

> I say that the best American citizens are on the East Side, because they bring their idealism with them; because they love America they are willing to sacrifice everything for America.

Does not radicalism flourish as well among natives as aliens? Bill Hayward, Eugene V. Debs, and William Foster are Anglo-Saxons. Rhode Island, our most alien State, has the least socialistic vote. The I. W. W. organization is, primarily, a native organization. Nor is radicalism limited to non-Nordics. New Zealand probably has the highest form of State socialism and is peopled almost totally by Nordics. The spread of radicalism is due not to the coming of any particular class of aliens but to industrial discontent. Grinding the faces of workmen, be they native or alien, is the primary cause.

It is significant that Mr. Sherman Rogers, associate editor of the Outlook—the Outlook is ultraimmigration restrictionist—despite our vast alien population, has recently observed the wane of radicalism in this country. He had discovered this on his recent 19,000 mile trip through various sections of the country.

Speaking February 16, 1924, before the National Republican Club, he said:

> The change was marvelous. I don't believe that there has been a period in the last 25 years when there was as great a confidence and cool-headedness displayed by the vast majority of business men, farmers, and workmen as during 1923. Radicalism that was rampant not only among workers but among farmers in 1922 was strikingly lacking last fall. * * * So far as radicalism in America is concerned, the hysteria of a few years ago has practically disappeared.

Might I not observe that this pleasant change is due to our industrial prosperity? And that this prosperity is created, as well as shared in, by all the peoples that make up our population, be they of the Nordic, Alpine, or Mediterranean races?

I fear these remarks have assumed undue length. You perhaps are exhausted by this time, although I assure you the subject is inexhaustible. Before concluding I must, however, let fly a shaft at Dr. Harry H. Laughlin and his "alleged" "Analysis of America's Melting Pot." Just as a drunkard's face is splotched with red stains, so Laughlin's report is splotched and soiled with wholesale inaccuracies and failure to consider factors that destroy the value of his conclusions. This report makes out a very bad case, indeed, for our immigrants, especially for the new immigrants, if it could be considered true. It purports to be a survey of our social inadequates in our custodial institutions. In the first place, it covered only 445, whereas there were 657 institutions in 1921, the date of his work. Secondly, its inclusion of the negro population in the figures, without due consideration and correction of the fact that there are comparatively few custodial institutions in the South that care for negroes except in criminal cases, has led him to silly conclusions. For example, he says that there is less tuberculosis among blacks than whites, less insane, feebleminded, epileptic, less blindness, deafness, deformity, dependency.

I ask my southern colleagues, "Does this square with your everyday experience?" The whole thing is absurd. The 1921 mortality statistics of the United States census shows a tuberculosis rate of negroes of 244 per 100,000, against a rate of approximately 86 per 100,000 for whites. The census figures are too accurate for Laughlin. He is the kind of pseudo-scientist who likes to force his conclusions, trusting to luck that no one will check him up. The Immigration Committee's chairman admitted to me that the facts concerning the negro had thrown askew all the figures contained in the report. Thousands upon thousands of copies of this report have been sent broadcast throughout the country. It purports to prove Nordic superiority. Now I ask the chairman of the committee what he did when he discovered these errors in the report. Did he send thousands upon thousands of copies of any statement of his admitting these errors throughout the country, or did he remain supine and fail to enlighten the country? No, indeed, the Nordic spell should not be exorcised. I earnestly and respectfully ask the chairman of the Immigration Committee to explain.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES].

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, on Monday last Mr. Charles M. Schwab, chairman of the board of directors of the Bethlehem Steel Co., which company controls the Bethlehem Shipbuilding Corporation, had a conference with President Coolidge, after which he announced that he had told the President among other things—that business men are anxious to proceed with development, but development and extensions have been held up by the uncertainty due to this hysteria and the holding up of the administration's tax-reduction program.

He said further that—he could say with certainty that the whole steel industry and those sections of Pennsylvania where they are situated are strong for the President for another term.

In determining whether Mr. Schwab's statements are the views of an unselfish political supporter or the views of a man who is seeking favors at the hands of the administration the President owes it to himself to read the story of the claim of Mr. Schwab's corporation against the Shipping Board as disclosed in official reports of the board. Of course, it may be only a coincidence that within a week after the appointment of a committee to investigate the Shipping Board Mr. Schwab confers with the President to advise him that the investigations are causing hysteria and are retarding business.

In common with all citizens of this country I hope for a continued improvement of business conditions, but if, in order to drive corruption out of government it is necessary to disturb business, then I am in favor of disturbing business. [Applause.]

But there may be an explanation of his conduct in the following facts:

During the war Mr. Schwab who controlled the Bethlehem Shipbuilding Corporation was made Director General of the Emergency Fleet Corporation. Necessarily he had to transact business with his own corporation. The relationship should have prompted him to be overscrupulous in seeing to it that the Government was protected in all dealings with the Bethlehem Corporation. I was one of those who believed he faithfully discharged that trust, but the Shipping Board reports have disillusioned me and will disillusion others.

After the war when Mr. Schwab had severed his connection with the Shipping Board the Bethlehem Shipbuilding Corporation filed with the board claims amounting to $13,377,403.28 on account of ships requisitioned or contracted for. Mr. Lasker, then chairman of the board, assigned to the investigation of the claims Mr. W. M. Bullitt, one of the attorneys of the board. Consideration of the matter makes it difficult to tell whether Mr. Bullitt was representing the Bethlehem Corporation or the Government. After investigating for nearly a year he filed a report recommending that the Government pay Bethlehem $5,982,874.83 instead of the $13,000,000 claimed by Bethlehem. The report concluded with the hope that action would be promptly taken in settlement.

Mr. Lasker and Mr. Bullitt presented the report to the Claims Committee composed of members of the board of which ex-Senator Chamberlain was chairman. Senator Chamberlain announced it would be investigated just like all other claims. It was, and the report of the Claims Committee was that instead of the Government owing Bethlehem either $13,377,403.28 as claimed by them, or $5,982,874.83 as recommended by Mr. Bullitt, that Bethlehem actually owed the Government $11,048,659.85. That was a difference of only $24,000,000 between the amount Mr. Schwab stated the Government owed him and the amount the Shipping Board determined Mr. Schwab owed the Government.

This report upon consideration was found to be so convincing and so just that every member of the board, including Mr. Lasker, voted to adopt it, and on June 12, 1923, instructed the legal department to proceed to collect from Bethlehem the $11,000,000 due to the Government.

Are you surprised at Schwab opposing investigations? He has had too much investigation of this one claim to suit him. Instead of getting away with $13,000,000 of the money of the people, he is being called upon to return $11,000,000 he has already gotten away with.

One hundred and nineteen ships were contracted for by Bethlehem under a contract providing for payment of the cost, plus a fixed fee for profits, and an additional provision for one-half of any savings below the amount estimated in the contract as the cost of the ship. Who suggested this form of contract I do not know. I sincerely hope that Schwab as director general did not suggest it for the contracts with his Bethlehem corporation. To illustrate: If the contract fixed the estimated price of the ship at $1,000,000, a fixed fee of, say, $100,000 was agreed upon, and then if the ship was completed for $900,000 instead of $1,000,000, that was regarded as a saving of $100,000, and the Bethlehem company would get one-half of that saving, or $50,000.

It is apparent that in such a contract the important thing was to fix the estimated cost of the ship very high so as to make savings possible.

And how well Mr. Schwab's corporation worked along this line can be gathered from the joint report of Admiral Bowles, manager of the steel-ship construction, and Captain Radford, manager of the contract division, filed at the time these contracts were made:

We wish to place on record the fact that the Bethlehem Shipbuilding Corporation's representatives have insisted on comparatively high prices for these vessels; that they have only with difficulty been persuaded to quote us on the types of ships referred to, and their attitude has been characterized by an arbitrary refusal to stand behind delivery dates. * * *

While the prices we have agreed to with representatives of the Bethlehem Shipbuilding Corporation are not satisfactory to us, nevertheless they represent a material reduction from the prices quoted by that corporation. Realizing the Nation will need these vessels, we have been actuated by the belief that further delay in placing the contracts should be eliminated, and we believe that we have made the best compromise possible under very difficult conditions.

In other words, taking advantage of the necessities of the Government in its hour of peril, the price fixed in the contracts as the estimated cost of the ships was fixed so high as to cause these two officials to file such a report with the Shipping Board.

With this understanding of how Bethlehem selfishly worked and succeeded in placing excessive amounts as the estimated cost, let us look at the profits. On a total cost, without profit, of $136,008,054 Bethlehem claims profits amounting to $29,159,782, or 21.44 per cent. It amounts to profit per deadweight ton of $45.15.

These profits are just four times as much as the profits paid to other shipbuilders. Taking 11 companies constructing ships for the Government, the average profit per deadweight ton was $10.82 as against the $45.15 claimed by Bethlehem. It must be remembered that the other companies had no representative acting as Director General of the Shipping Board. Bethlehem did.

We have heard much complaint about the contracts providing cost plus 10 per cent. What about this Bethlehem corporation claiming cost plus 21 per cent? Of course, this excessive profit is arrived at through the provision allowing half savings, which amounted to $14,000,000. To allow Bethlehem cost plus 21 per cent would give encouragement to every Shylock in the Nation in time of war. When cost plus 10 per cent is allowed as recommended by the board, Bethlehem owes the Government $11,000,000.

Mr. Schwab asserted the justice of this position as to all other contractors. As director general he repudiated 134 contracts with the American Shipbuilding Co., because he thought the profits excessive and merged them into a single contract providing a cost plus 10 per cent profit. Writing Mr. Hurley of his achievement, he stated:

I think that this readjustment is a fair one and that it will prove an object lesson to any other contractors who think they can take advantage of us to obtain excessive prices for ships.

It was a lesson to all except himself. Director General Schwab could prevent others from taking advantage of the Government, but Director General Schwab apparently could not prevent President Schwab of the Bethlehem Co. from taking advantage of the Government.

Mr. Schwab then took the position that in time of war no contracts were binding where excess compensation was exacted. In his letter to Mr. Hurley he boasted:

I immediately sent for Mr. Farr and demanded that he consent at once to a reduction in the price of his contracts * * *. Mr. Farr demurred at making any reduction, so that, acting on Mr. Cuthell's advice, I told him we would amend all his contracts so as to limit his company to what we considered to be just compensation * * *. Mr. Farr then agreed that he would execute binding agreements modifying all his contracts so that in no event would his company make in excess of 10 per cent profits.

Now, the same Mr. Schwab objects to amending the contracts he made with his Bethlehem Corporation. Mr. Farr, of the American Shipbuilding Co., ought to be employed to handle the claim of the Government against the Bethlehem Co. in order to properly impress Mr. Schwab.

In a letter from Mr. Farr to Mr. Hurley in September, 1918, he stated "Mr. Schwab stated that he had advised President Wilson that he thought the shipbuilders should be entitled to 10 per cent profit."

The shipbuilders, he advised President Wilson, should receive only 10 per cent profit, and yet when he comes to his own corporation he demands not only 10 per cent but cost-plus 21 per cent profit.

There is another phase to this case. Mr. Schwab left the Fleet Corporation after the armistice. But just as soon as Mr. Lasker was made chairman he evidently concluded that the Fleet Corporation could not function without a representative of Bethlehem, so he made Mr. J. W. Powell, vice president of the Bethlehem Corporation, the president of the Fleet Corporation. Before the Appropriations Committee Mr. Powell stated that he had an interest in the claims pending against the Shipping Board by Bethlehem, but as an official of the board would have nothing to do with them. The hearings show the following:

Mr. DICKINSON. What are the claims for?

Mr. POWELL. I don't know; I have not even wanted to know that much about it. I have no idea.

Mr. LASKER. I doubt if they have any claim that the Shipping Board can allow, from what I have heard from some who claim to know.

Mr. POWELL. They had a valid claim all right at the time I left them.

Some might be disposed to believe that the stenographer had made a mistake, but we must recall that the manuscript is submitted to a witness before it is printed by the Committee on Appropriations.

One second he had no idea what the claim was about and the next second he was sure they had a valid claim when he left. Let us see if he was interested. The employee of the Shipping Board who was most familiar with the facts in connection with this Bethlehem claim was an examiner, Mr. Tilden Adamson. While working on the case he was suddenly notified that he was discharged. He reported the fact to a member of the board, and several members inquired of Mr. Lasker the cause of dismissal. They were informed that Mr. Powell wanted Adamson discharged because Adamson kept a diary of conversations had with members of the board. When informed of it Adamson denied it and demanded proof. It was not forthcoming, and as members of the board demanded fair play, Adamson was retained and is to-day in the employ of the board. He continued to work with the Claims Committee until the completion of the report.

In trying to discharge Adamson was Mr. Powell, the former vice president of Bethlehem, representing the Government or the Bethlehem Shipbuilding Corporation?

But there is another angle to this case. On June 12, 1923, the board unanimously called on the legal department to proceed to collect the $11,000,000 from Bethlehem. In September, 1923, the Department of Justice informally asked for more information about the claim. The report of the Claims Committee was exhaustive, but the Attorney General evidently wanted more information. Four months later this information had not been furnished by the Shipping Board, but a few weeks ago I was told that it would be furnished within a few days. One attorney was placed in charge of securing the information, and then was taken off the work to do so many other things that he could not prepare the information desired. When nine months after the board demanded action, nothing has been done toward bringing suit to recover the $11,000,000, one is forced to wonder as to the forces that are at work to delay action in recovering this money.

I know that this is campaign year. I know that with this $11,000,000 claim pending against Bethlehem Mr. Schwab and the directors and stockholders of Bethlehem will be disposed to be exceedingly generous; in fact, Mr. Schwab shows evidence of generosity in his statement pledging the whole steel industry to Mr. Coolidge for another term. But I do not want the Department of Justice and the Shipping Board to forget this little claim. Five years have elapsed since the armistice. The claim ought to be settled. If $100,000,000 is needed for the soldiers' bonus next year, you can get one-tenth of it out of this Bethlehem claim, and I know of no source from which the boys would rather have it come. If, as in the oil cases, any friends of Mr. Daugherty are in the Bethlehem Corporation, and he is embarrassed at all, let the President employ special attorneys and proceed to collect.

The Government has not hesitated to proceed against the individual who owed $100 on his income tax. It has not hesitated to force dependent mothers who during the war received overpayments, to reimburse the Government. Now, let the Government proceed, before the election, to bring suit to recover from Bethlehem the unconscionable profits extorted by them when the Nation was in peril.

Four years ago we heard the slogan, "Less government in business; more business in government." Little progress has been made in eliminating government from business, and too much progress has been made in putting into government the wrong kind of business. Instead of putting this kind of business into government, let us put a little old-fashioned honesty into government. [Applause.]

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BROWNING].

Mr. BROWNING. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, some time ago the Democratic conference in the House named five Members of our ex-service men to confer with the Ways and Means Committee on the form and substance which we should have for an adjusted-compensation measure. I was one of those men. We went before that committee and each insisted on a twofold plan for an adjusted compensation, that the soldiers should have the option of either a paid-up insurance or cash, as they saw fit. When it came to the determination in that committee as to what the plan should be every one of the 11 Democratic Members on the committee voted for a cash option, together with 1 Republican Member, the gentleman from New York [Mr. CROWTHER]. That cash option was defeated in that committee 13 to 12, and this House is overwhelmingly for a cash option, and——

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I think I shall have to make a point of order against the gentleman's statement. I do not think it is permissible under the rules of the House to state how anybody voted in committee.

Mr. BROWNING. All right. I will say the newspaper reports gave it that way if that will be satisfactory to the gentleman, and I also have other reliable information to that effect.

Mr. RANKIN. Does the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] deny that to be a fact?

Mr. MADDEN. I say it is not permissible under the rules to make such a statement.

Mr. BROWNING. If it is not permissible under the rules to make such a statement, I will say that that is how the newspapers reported it.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. I think that what the gentleman from Illinois said would be true in regard to members on a committee disclosing what transpired in the committee, but my colleague from Tennessee is not a member of that committee. He is speaking from information in reference to this matter.

Mr. MADDEN. I am perfectly satisfied with the statement he made as to its being a newspaper rumor.

Mr. BROWNING. I can say that is not the only source of my information——

Mr. MADDEN. I do not think the gentleman was in the committee——

Mr. BROWNING. I was not in the committee in executive session, but I was when they had the public hearings.

Mr. MADDEN. Then the gentleman does not know that to be the fact.

Mr. BROWNING. That is a matter of information.

Mr. MADDEN. That is all right, but the gentleman can not make the statement that he knows positively as to how they voted.

Mr. BROWNING. I do not intend to claim that I was in the executive session of the Ways and Means Committee, but I will state further to the gentleman from Illinois that I do not believe that statement will be denied by anyone on this floor, that it is a fact.

Mr. TINCHER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWNING. I will.

Mr. TINCHER. Does the gentleman mean that he is authorized to state that all the Democratic members of the Ways and Means Committee are for a bonus, for a cash bonus?

Mr. BROWNING. I will state from information and belief that each Democratic member of the Ways and Means Committee voted for a cash option in a bill to be reported out.

Mr. TINCHER. For a bonus?

Mr. BROWNING. So far as their vote is concerned on that measure it received the unanimous——

Mr. TINCHER. There were some changes.

Mr. BROWNING. I will state to the gentleman that he can obtain the definite information on that if he will persuade the organization on his side of the House to take off the gag rule which, it has been indicated here this morning, would be placed on us.

Mr. TINCHER. Does the gentleman say the gag rule was placed on him by his consent this morning?

Mr. BROWNING. No, I do not say that, but I will say that the indications are that we will have to take it in the one way in which it is brought up or not at all. Mr. Chairman, I refuse to yield further. I have a speech in my system which I want to deliver.

Now, this morning we are informed this measure is to be brought in with no cash option in the bill. In other words the ex-service men of this Nation are still treated as pygmies and as babies, and should not be paid that which this Government so justly owes——

Mr. RANKIN. If the gentleman will permit, the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. TINCHER] said that the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BROWNING] had a right to object to this gag rule this morning. He did not have the right to do anything of the kind. If he had objected, it would have moved it up to Monday instead of Tuesday.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWNING. I will.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. It is also true, of course, that there will be a larger attendance on Tuesday than on Monday, and anybody objecting to the passage of the proposed legislation under the suspension of the rules will have a better chance to defeat it with a smaller than a larger attendance.

Mr. BROWNING. Well, I will say to the gentleman from Illinois that if he will assure me that we will have a chance for this bill to be brought out at an early date, a special rule that will permit amendment and debate, I will vote against the suspension of the rules.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I will tell the gentleman how he can get the consideration of that bill under the ordinary rules of the House, and that is to vote against the motion to suspend the rules and pass the bill, and if the bill fails to pass under suspension it will certainly come up under the general rules of the House.

Mr. BROWNING. How soon? We do not want to smother it, but want the bill passed.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. As one member of the Committee on Ways and Means, I would be in favor of bringing it in as soon as it can be brought up.

Mr. BROWNING. I thank the gentleman for that assurance. I will ask the gentleman if he is for a cash bonus?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I am not for a cash bonus; I am for the present bill.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. If I might be permitted to remark, the gentleman from Illinois is not in charge of the proceedings of the House. We are dependent upon a few gentlemen upon the other side who constitute, I suppose, the steering committee to say what shall come up and what shall not come up.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I do not pretend to be in charge of this side of the House, but the gentleman [Mr. BROWNING] spoke to me, or rather asked me a question, and I answered it as best I could.

Mr. CARTER. Well, the gentleman who is speaking understands, certainly, that the only way the bill could come up in a regular manner would be by placing it on the calendar and letting it take its turn; and there would not be much opportunity afforded for its coming up.

Mr. BROWNING. If we vote against a suspension of the rules we are at a very far distance from getting this measure before the House unless the gentleman can assure me that it will be brought out under a special rule to permit amendments and debate.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I can not say whether this bill, coming from the Committee on Ways and Means, is privileged or not. Revenue bills generally have a privileged status. Whether this particular bill will have a privileged status I do not know.

Mr. BROWNING. Of course, if the gentleman can not give me any information on the subject I should prefer to proceed in my own way.

Mr. POU. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWNING. Yes.

Mr. POU. Everybody understands that the ex-service men are going to be buncoed by this Congress, and what is the use of having any foolishness about it? [Applause.]

Mr. BROWNING. Yes. I wish to protest at this time against what I consider a gross injustice to the House. I know that on the Democratic side of the Chamber the vast majority of the Members want to do these men justice in the right way, and I believe the majority on the other side do; but I do not think it fair that the House shall be subjected to the criticism that will come to us if we undertake to give something that is an absolute abortion under the guise of adjusted compensation. [Applause.]

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, does the gentleman care to yield?

Mr. BROWNING. I would prefer not to.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. BROWNING. The principle involved in adjusted compensation long since has been definitely established in the minds of a vast majority of the American people. They have decided the question in favor of a payment to the ex-service men part of the wages they would have commanded had they been free to seek employment at prevailing prices during the war. And the people are trusting Congress to carry out the solemn mandate of public opinion.

More than five years have elapsed since the crack of the last gun sounded the end of a gruesome and staggering conflict. More than five years the heroes of that struggle have known the overwhelming verdict of their Nation, but have seen the execution of this judgment delayed without justification. And they have witnessed for the past three months the most wicked and diabolical contrivances ever perpetrated on a nation flaunted brazenly to defeat what they consider a matter of eminent justice to them.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWNING. Yes.

Mr. SNYDER. The gentleman calls this bill "an abortion." I agree with him. Will the gentleman vote for the bill?

Mr. BROWNING. If I can not get any better one I will.

Mr. SNYDER. Well, I will not.

Mr. BROWNING. With those who oppose adjusted compensation because they consider it a price placed on patriotism, and an attempt to value the personal sacrifices of these men, I have no quarrel. I just respectfully differ with them. We all agree that their unselfish and hazardous offering placed on the Nation's altar can not be measured in money. But I have yet to see the consistency of placing a financial penalty on a man who for the sake of duty placed his body in front of the spearpoint of danger in defending a cause common to us all. I have yet to encounter one convincing argument that this man should arbitrarily be paid a pittance while others just as vitally interested in the outcome, and equally qualified for similar service, are having flattering wages lavished upon them. I confess I can not follow the logic of those who are insisting in substance that because his mission was fraught with dangers and untold hardships he must not expect a remuneration in any measure approaching his fellow countryman who sought unhampered the biggest wages ever known in our marts of trade.

There is no argument impugning the motives of the ex-service men who have insisted on some adjustment of this discriminatory result that would not brand every man who accepted a dollar a day while fighting as an unpatriotic ingrate because he had deigned to touch the dollar as a return for his service to his country. Those who refer to this as a "raid on the Treasury" are thereby pouring upon the head of every man who wore the uniform the unction of infamy because he was paid.

When we came out of the war with 23,000 more millionaires than we entered it we heard no loud denunciation of these shrewd individuals as being unpatriotic. On November 11, 1918, the War Department had uncompleted contracts outstanding of $6,700,000,000. It cost the Government approximately $3,400,000,000 to adjust these claims with contractors. Yet no one called them unpatriotic because they demanded and received this adjustment. One billion seven hundred million dollars has been paid by the Government to the railroads for adjustments and guaranties growing out of the war. Vast amounts were expended in adjustments by the Navy Department and the Shipping Board. These matters have aroused no wave of censure of those who benefited. Only the men who fought have been singled out and taken to task for even presuming they should recoup a part of their financial losses because of the war. They are being called mercenary, while all other elements without reflection are replete by adjustment.

I concede the right of our great Government to commandeer the services of a citizen to fight during a war. And I maintain that same right attaches to every citizen during a war for a necessary purpose, and also to every resource under our national jurisdiction. I concede the wisdom of the method used to select men for the fighting, since the job had to be done. Young men are preeminently fitted above all others for the rigors of war. But we should remember that at the time of their selection those of us who were under 21 and over 31 years of age were in a vast majority. We should remember further that these men had no voice in the fixing of their remuneration; and, be it said to their everlasting credit, they did not quibble over their scant allowance in the face of national peril.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWNING. Yes.

Mr. HUDSPETH. The gentleman is a member of the American Legion, is he not?

Mr. BROWNING. Yes, sir.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Are they fooling the ex-service men by making them believe that they are giving them a real bonus? The American Legion boys do not believe that they are going to give them a real bonus?

Mr. BROWNING. I do not think so.

Mr. HUDSPETH. After the next election the Democratic Party will give the ex-service man a real bonus. [Applause.]

Mr. BROWNING. I will say to the gentleman that if the Congress expects to get rid of this question, since the men feel that they are entitled to a real adjustment, it had better realize now that 90 per cent of the men want cash and are entitled to it, and they will not let us rest until we give them the right kind of an adjustment.

Adjustment with others has been made on the ground of either contract or moral obligation on the part of the Government to protect the financial interest of those who employed their resources and efforts to further the cause of the war, either voluntarily or under compulsion. It can not be said that these men are bound by contract to what they have already received. A contract is always an expression of the will or the intent of the party to be bound.

So I rest my contention on what I verily believe to be the untainted collective judgment of the ex-service men of the Nation, as well as the overwhelming verdict of the American people, that the Government is under moral obligation to discharge a belated debt of justice and gratitude. As a Member of this House, with me that obligation has the binding power of a promise, a contract, an oath, or a vow. I make no distinction between legal and moral duty. Whether it be an obligation of conscience, of affection, or of law should make no difference. God grant that the time may never come when a burning sense of duty is too feeble to induce the Congress of the United States to comply with a national obligation!

Some men in the service actually received nothing for months at a time. I have known them to make compulsory allotments of a part of their salary, pay for insurance, and receive the startling sum of 50 cents to use as they saw fit for a month's service.

There is a large class of these men who entered the service in as robust condition as men ever grow. They performed almost superhuman tasks of endurance and exposure and physical exertion. Many the times they wondered if it were possible to carry their burden a step farther. They inhaled poisonous fumes; they underwent the nervous strain of battle's shock and roar. Naturally these ordeals wore away and undermined their constitutions. But they never cracked under the strain; they waived all opportunities to complain after the job was finished, through anxiety to get home. Since then the natural law of retribution has taken its toll out of their lives, and they are falling by the wayside. When in good faith they have applied for the benefits provided for the disabled they have heard the inflexible decree, "Not connected with the service." The payment of this debt would alleviate in part the unfortunate handicap of these men and cause them to think possibly the Government on whose altar they laid their health and their peace of mind is not ungrateful.

The good will of more than 4,000,000 men is a matter not to be scorned with indifference. These soldiers have a right to believe that under any fair comparison of relative values of service they have been discriminated against. They know now that there has been a deliberate conspiracy on the part of the Secretary of the Treasury, aided and abetted by a ruthless combine of financial buccaneers who have grown bold and arrogant on the wine of privilege. Figures are juggled in the Treasury to show in turn a deficit or a surplus to meet the exigencies of their designs.

In my judgment any Member of this House with a sense of fair play, with a decent respect for the truth, regardless of his convictions on the principles involved, can vote for adjusted compensation, and thereby do less violence to his conscience than if he should line up with these apostles of duplicity and falsehood to vote against it. The plans used to smother the measure through coercion and deception have been base and their execution unscrupulous. Their contention that no tax reduction can be had if this measure is passed has no relation to the truth. And the official responsible for the agitation to this effect has debased and subverted the Treasury Department to his greedy and selfish personal use.

We either owe this debt or we should disavow it. If we owe it, as I am insisting that we do, we should pay it just as we meet every national obligation, with money. This Government is not so weak or poverty stricken that it must offer chips and whetstones to those who have a claim for services rendered. A great part of the primary purpose of adjusted compensation has already been defeated by unwarranted delay, at the time above all others when they needed it most. Now we are asking them to accept assurance that their estates at their death will receive the money they have earned. Even if a man can borrow money on an insurance policy you are forcing him to pay interest for the use of money the Government owes him. This is a matter highly personal to these men. Ninety per cent of them want the cash to invest as they choose. A vast majority of them need it now to pay debts; to help bring comfort to a home, or to tide themselves over the rough places until they can get on their feet. What right has Congress to persist in acting as guardian and dictator for these men in relation to their property? They have proven themselves worthy of trust while holding the fate of the world in their hands. Can we not now intrust to their keeping that which belongs to them without hobbling it with infinite conditions?

I am for a cash option to those who desire it. One billion dollars will pay all who apply for cash. This will remove the necessity for the creation of a new bureau to become a hotbed of graft and scandal. This, with an option of paid-up insurance, will satisfy all the ex-service men of America. They will be satisfied with nothing less. They have a right to ask to be paid in money if they prefer it.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWNING. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. I have listened attentively to what the gentleman has said. Taking his view upon it, why should not those of us who are in favor of a bonus, defeat, on the motion to suspend the rules, the bill they are going to bring in here, and then compel them to come back and pass a proper bonus bill?

Mr. BROWNING. If I could have any assurance that we can compel them to come back and pass a decent bill, I will be with the gentleman.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWNING. Yes.

Mr. SNYDER. Why do not you use this new rule that was adopted awhile ago, and see how it will work?

Mr. BROWNING. We have no assurance that we can get a special rule that will give us an opportunity.

Mr. RAKER. I hate to vote for a suspension of the rules when, under the gentleman's statement, I would stultify myself by trying to vote for what the ex-service men desire.

Mr. BROWNING. As to the men in this House who really favor adjusted compensation, I do not want to put them in the light, by my insistence, of going back to their constituents and telling them that they defeated the chance to get a vote on adjusted compensation when they claim that they see merit in this bill.

Mr. RAKER. You do not see any merit in it?

Mr. BROWNING. I think it is next to the best we can get, but I do not think it is adjusted compensation. I think that 90 per cent of the men want the money for their services that they are clearly entitled to. [Applause.]

It is absurd to say the burden would be oppressive. A few days ago this body voted to give back to the income-tax payers $232,000,000 of last year's taxes which by the argument broadcast to the Nation by the Mellonites had already been passed on to the consumer by the rich taxpayers; and I have no doubt such is largely the case, except as to earned incomes and salaries. Yet Congress makes them a straight gift of this fat sum without any visible sign of a seared conscience. This would be enough, with the $100,000,000 surplus left in the Treasury, already on hand, to pay one-third of the entire amount in cash, which some would have you believe will bankrupt the Nation.

Why not face this question under the light of truth? Why not be done with giving these men false assurances that next time their debt will be paid? Why not restore the good will and confidence of the flower of our manhood in this great Government? To make them feel that gratitude does not rest on their ability to do future service but springs from the deep sense of obligation for past sacrifices on their part will be worth far more to the Nation than the funds required to meet it. They feel that they have been ruthlessly attacked by those who have spoken disparagingly of this proposed adjustment. They believe they have witnessed the thing once known as lip proclamation of patriotic pride in them turned to the slanderous abuses of envy and selfishness. That is why they are now demanding what they conceive to be eminent justice.

I repeat that because patriotism can not be measured in money is no reason for penalizing those who have proven to be its embodiment. This obligation is fixed in the minds of an overwhelming majority of the American people. They will rightly denounce any plan or scheme to thwart its immediate payment in an honorable manner, namely, in money, as all debts are discharged.

This is a test of whether we still hold in our hearts a warm and friendly feeling toward a benefactor; whether we have kindness awakened in us by a favor received; whether we are willing to live the professions of gratitude that once fell from our lips. An Army more than 4,000,000 strong, together with the millions whose hearts are just where they stood on November 11, 1918, is waiting for your answer. If the enemies of a real adjusted compensation measure succeed in defeating the will of the people, these men have left to them the pledge of all faithful hearts that their unselfish devotion shall not be forgotten so long as men worship at freedom's shrine. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 15 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I desire to take a little time of the committee to call attention to a situation that exists in the country to-day—a condition, gentlemen, which in my opinion strikes at the very foundation of our form of Government.

I am advised that on March 8 the Committee on the Census of the House of Representatives met and determined that it would not report out an apportionment bill at this session of Congress, in fact, decided that it would not consider an apportionment bill before the next session, which convenes in December, 1924. What reasons prompted the committee to adopt this course, I do not know; but, whatever the motives, the action of the committee should not have the approval of this House.

Article I, section 2, of the Constitution expressly provides that Representatives and direct taxes shall be apportioned among the several States which may be included within this Union according to their respective numbers; that the actual enumeration shall be made within three years after the first meeting of the Congress of the United States, and within every subsequent term of 10 years, in such manner as they shall by law direct. The actual enumeration was made as directed by law in 1920 and the population of the several States was determined. More than three years have elapsed since the count was completed, yet during that time Congress has failed to do its plain duty and to apportion Representatives in the manner directed by the Constitution.

This plain disregard of the direct mandate of the Constitution should not be permitted to continue further. It is the duty of this Congress to pass an apportionment bill with the least possible delay. The legislatures of most of the States will meet in January, 1925. If apportionment is postponed until the next session of Congress, it can hardly be expected that a bill can be passed in time for the legislatures to redistrict their States. Delayed action simply means that the situation will continue to grow worse.

Because of the failure of Congress to do its duty in this matter, a situation exists in the House of Representatives that is in direct violation of the Constitution and should not be tolerated by fair-minded Americans. No matter at what number the membership of the House might be fixed, there are States to-day enjoying a relative representation in this House to which they are not entitled, while other States are deprived of their just representation in this body. The census of 1920 gave to the State of Washington a population of 1,356,621; to the State of Connecticut, 1,380,631; and to the State of Nebraska, 1,296,372. Yet, by the failure of Congress to act, the States of Washington and Connecticut are represented in this House by 5 Members, while the State of Nebraska, with a smaller population, has 6. The last census showed that the population of California was 22,806 more than that of the State of Missouri, yet to-day Missouri has 16 Representatives in Congress while the State of California has but 11. The States of California, Iowa, and Kentucky each have at the present time 11 Representatives in Congress, yet according to the last census California's population was more than a million in excess of either Iowa or Kentucky. Michigan and Indiana each have 13 Representatives in the House, but under the census of 1920, the membership of the House remaining the same, Michigan would be entitled to 15 and Indiana to 12.

These are but a few of the inequalities that exist, but they are sufficient, nevertheless, to demonstrate the unfairness and injustice of the present situation.

The States of California, Connecticut, Michigan, New Jersey, North Carolina, Ohio, Texas, and Washington are to-day being denied the relative representation in the House of Representatives guaranteed to them under the Constitution, while the States of Indiana, Iowa, Kansas, Kentucky, Louisiana, Maine, Mississippi, Missouri, Nebraska, Rhode Island, and Vermont are enjoying a relative representation to which they are not in any way entitled.

It is not my purpose to do any State an injustice or to deny to any State the representation to which it is entitled, but I do insist that it is the duty of this Congress to accord to all of the States the representation to which they are entitled and to prevent injustice being done to any of them. How long is this inequitable and unfair condition to be permitted to exist? Is the Congress to remain inactive while large portions of our population continue to be deprived of their just representation and other sections continue to be overrepresented? This situation can not go on indefinitely. It should have been corrected three years ago, but Congress has failed to act. Such failure is, to my mind, inexcusable and can not be condoned.

It has been argued that the number of Representatives of any State should not be reduced. Nevertheless that has been done many times heretofore. In 1830 Kentucky had 13 Representatives; to-day it has 11. In 1830 Maine had 8; to-day it has 4. In 1810 Vermont had 6, and it now has 2. Eighteen States have heretofore had their congressional representation reduced by various apportionment acts, several of them more than once. The total membership of the House was reduced in 1840. It was not until 1880 that the practice of apportionment so that no State would lose any of its Representatives became an apparent policy of Congress. Prior to that time it was common to reduce the number of Representatives in various States. The result of the policy of taking care of the States so that none of them shall lose Representatives is that the House has reached, if not passed, its extreme limit in membership for proper functioning.

There can be but one reason for further delaying the passage of an apportionment bill, and that is local expediency, and local expediency should not be permitted to stand in the way of the general welfare or to prevent Congress from carrying out the express mandate of the Constitution.

It has been contended that the last census was taken under abnormal conditions; that there was at that time an unusual movement of population from the country districts to the cities; that the trend has since been back to the country, and a subsequent census would show a different condition as to population in some of the States. The movement of rural population to the cities has been going on for a considerable period of time. It was not peculiar to the year 1920. The last census fairly represents conditions at the time it was taken. It is the only basis upon which Congress can act; and even though an abnormal movement of population did exist, it can not be taken as an excuse for the failure by Congress to do its duty under the Constitution.

In the apportionment following the census of 1910 the membership of the House was increased from 391 to 435, the present number. If the membership had been retained at 391, the same States that would now lose Representatives in an apportionment, based on the present membership of the House, would have then lost Representatives, except Vermont, Mississippi, and Louisiana, and they would have about held their own. This to my mind clearly demonstrates that there was no greatly abnormal drift or movement of population from rural to urban in 1920.

I desire to call attention to another existing inequality due to the failure of Congress to pass an apportionment bill. In November of this year we shall hold a presidential election. Presidential electors will be chosen in each of the States, and by their votes the President and Vice President will be chosen in accordance with the Constitution. Article II, section 1, of the Constitution provides that—

> Each State shall appoint, in such manner as the legislature thereof may direct, a number of electors equal to the whole number of Senators and Representatives to which the State may be entitled in Congress.

One of the very purposes of this provision was that the Electoral College should be representative of the population of the various States, and to base the number of electors from each State as nearly as practicable upon the population of that State.

What is the situation that confronts us in the coming presidential election? Nebraska, with a population less than that of Connecticut or Washington, will have a greater voice in the election of the next President than either Connecticut or Washington. California, with a population larger than that of Missouri, will have about two-thirds as much to say about who shall be President as Missouri. California, with 3,426,000 population, will have no greater voice in the selection of a President than Iowa, with 2,404,000, or Kentucky, with 2,416,000. Michigan's 3,668,000 population will have no more to say in the next election than Indiana's 2,930,000, and so on down the line. Certain States will wield a greater influence in the next presidential election than other States having a larger population.

The Committee on the Census should report an apportionment bill, or the rules of the House should be invoked to discharge the committee. I realize that owing to the fact that primaries will soon be held in many of the States, an apportionment immediately effective would cause much confusion. For that reason the act should not become effective before March 4, 1927.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARBOUR. Yes.

Mr. RANKIN. The gentleman has just used as one of his arguments the statement that a reapportionment bill would readjust the vote in the Electoral College. Now he says it should not take effect until March 4, 1927.

Mr. BARBOUR. My friend from Mississippi misunderstood me. We understand each other on most questions, but in this instance the gentleman from Mississippi misunderstands me.

I pointed out that the situation as to the Electoral College exists because of the failure of Congress to apportion heretofore. I am not arguing that we should apportion now so that we can have an equality of representation, you might say, in the next presidential election. That, to my mind, is now impossible.

Mr. RANKIN. This reapportionment, then, if it should take place in December, would have the same effect as a bill passed now, would it not?

Mr. BARBOUR. But there is no assurance that we will have any bill, even next December. My friend from Mississippi knows as well as I do that for the past three years I, for one, have been working to force a bill out of the committee and the gentleman from Mississippi has stood at the bridgehead and blocked the way.

Mr. RANKIN. Will the gentleman yield for a personal question?

Mr. BARBOUR. Yes.

Mr. RANKIN. I understand the gentleman is in charge of the time. Will he yield me five minutes when he gets through?

Mr. BARBOUR. I am temporarily in charge of the time, but I am sure the gentleman can get time on his own side of the aisle.

Mr. RANKIN. No; the time has been exhausted, I will say to the gentleman.

Mr. BARBOUR. I will say to my friend from Mississippi that I do not know how the time has been allotted, but I am quite certain that if I have said anything that does not meet with his approval he will soon be able to get time to reply to the statements I have made.

Mr. RANKIN. The gentleman means before the bill comes up?

Mr. BARBOUR. Probably.

Mr. MACLAFFERTY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARBOUR. Yes.

Mr. MACLAFFERTY. I happen to be a member of the Committee on the Census and also to be a Representative from a State which is entitled, on the basis of the census of 1920, to three additional Congressmen. I am firmly of the belief that it is not the intention of the Census Committee that we shall be permitted to apportion at any time during this Congress. For that reason would it not be well for my friend to take notice of the fact that there is at the Speaker's desk a petition directing the discharge of this committee and the bringing of such a bill on the floor of the House, thus giving the people of the United States, as they may be located in different States to-day, representation where they have not that representation now?

Mr. BARBOUR. I will say to my friend from California that only to-day I received a California newspaper—and I have received others—severely condemning the action of the Committee on the Census. They feel that with the population they have in that State—and in other States which have grown in population—they are entitled to an increased number of Representatives in this body.

Mr. RANKIN. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. BARBOUR. Yes; for a question.

Mr. RANKIN. I wonder whether the gentleman knows that it has been suggested that what California lacks in quantity of Representatives is made up in quality, and that, therefore, California is pretty well on a par with other States. [Laughter.]

Mr. BARBOUR. I am willing to concede that the quality of California's representation is reasonably good.

Mr. MACLAFFERTY. Will the gentleman yield to me in order that I may make a statement to the gentleman from Mississippi?

Mr. BARBOUR. Yes.

Mr. MACLAFFERTY. I want to say, in response to the statement made by the gentleman from Mississippi, that he made the same statement in committee and that I, as a Representative from California, cheerfully agreed—as all California Representatives agree—that we do make up in quality what we lack in quantity, but unfortunately our constituents are unwilling to concede it.

Mr. BARBOUR. I did not assume for a moment that my friend from Mississippi was paying me a personal compliment.

Mr. RANKIN. I did not refer to the statement made in committee because I was afraid I might be divulging a secret and that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] might make a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Chairman, may I have one more minute?

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman one additional minute.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California is recognized for one additional minute.

Mr. HASTINGS. Does the proposed bill increase the membership of the House?

Mr. BARBOUR. No.

Mr. HASTINGS. It retains the same number?

Mr. BARBOUR. Yes. In conclusion, I contend that Congress can not in justice longer postpone an apportionment of Representatives under the census of 1920. We have a duty which we can not avoid. It is for the Congress to fix the number of Representatives, but whatever is done in that regard, we can no longer follow a do-nothing policy and avoid our plain duty under the Constitution without meriting the condemnation of all fair-minded persons. [Applause.]

Mr. HERSEY. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BARBOUR. Yes.

Mr. HERSEY. Under the census of 1920 the House attempted to make an apportionment, did it not?

Mr. BARBOUR. Twice.

Mr. HERSEY. First by a bill making the membership 483, which would increase it as we have been doing for 100 years, and yet the gentleman now addressing the House opposed that measure with all his might, although that measure would have given California her increase, would it not?

Mr. BARBOUR. It would have given California five; but I took the position then, as I take it now, that this body is large enough. Four hundred and thirty-five Members are enough for the proper conduct of the business of the House.

Mr. HERSEY. But the gentleman opposed that bill, did he not?

Mr. BARBOUR. I did not oppose the bill, but I offered an amendment reducing the number from 483 to 435, and then I voted for 435.

Mr. HERSEY. Then we had a bill proposing to increase the membership to 460.

Mr. BARBOUR. Yes.

Mr. HERSEY. Which would have taken care of California.

Mr. BARBOUR. It would have taken care of California, but California is not looking for a large number of Representatives.

Mr. HERSEY. Did the gentleman oppose that bill?

Mr. BARBOUR. I voted to recommit that bill, because I am opposed to increasing the number of the House.

Mr. HERSEY. That bill was defeated, was it not?

Mr. BARBOUR. It was recommitted to the committee; but I stood then for 435 Members of the House and I now stand for 435 Members. That is an entirely different thing from refusing to pass any apportionment bill.

Mr. HERSEY. I do not think an apportionment should be made under a census taken four or five years ago, because the population has radically changed. Does not the gentleman think we ought to have another census of the population before we make an apportionment?

Mr. BARBOUR. We already have one, taken in 1920. Because Congress has failed to do its duty after a census is taken is no reason why the country should be put to the expense of now taking another census. We already have one which so far we have failed to act under.

Mr. HERSEY. But that can not be considered as reliable.

Mr. BARBOUR. Everybody who has looked into it knows that it is reliable.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. MACGREGOR].

Mr. MACGREGOR. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, it is not very often I get mad, but once in a while I can not quite restrain myself. I get the Wall Street Journal every day for the purpose of finding out what the plutocrats are doing and what they are saying. It is probably the worst Bolshevik paper in the United States. I do not take so much umbrage at its continually casting slurs and opprobrium upon Congress and Members of Congress, but when it goes outside of that and proceeds to make such remarks as are contained in the editorial column of last Wednesday I think then it is high time that somebody should say something with reference to this pernicious journal. In the fore part of this editorial there is this language:

> In the quest of a soldiers' bonus its advocates in Washington are making a last desperate offensive from their Hindenburg line. Congressman GARNER thinks that the matter should be "settled" in the interest of the country's business. But to grant these panhandlers their unearned and indefensible dole would settle nothing.

Such language as that with reference to our soldiers who went across to fight the battles of our country and to save the property and fortunes of these gentlemen who are interested in this particular kind of a newspaper is contemptible. It seems to me that any man who would write that stuff and put it in a newspaper should be immediately fired from the paper. I think he is worthy of all the censure that any people can place upon him, and I for one want to take exception to any such remarks being made in any publication in this country with reference to the boys who went to fight our fight. Anybody who makes a statement of that kind is a cur.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. STENGLE. Mr. Chairman, in a few days the House will be called upon to pass judgment upon the request of the postal employees of our country for a living wage, to decide whether or not loyalty and faithfulness to public duty shall receive its just reward, and to vote upon a measure which will have as its ultimate end the lifting of untold burdens which conditions and circumstances have placed upon the shoulders of thousands of efficient Government servants who uncomplainingly play a most important part in our daily life and activities.

Who is there among us that desires to crush faithful service? Who wants any servant, either in public or private employment, to labor without deserved compensation? Who, in this enlightened age, hopes to annul the scriptural injunction that "The laborer is worthy of his hire"?

It is conceded everywhere, throughout the vast reaches of the American Continent, by both rich and poor, high and low, that the greatest and most dependable beehive of public industry is the Post Office Department. Whether you think of its efficient clerks, its splendid letter carriers, its magnificent Railway Mail Service, or its accurate Rural Free Delivery system, your heart is bound to swell with pride and your soul to breathe expressions of gratefulness for service well rendered.

I hold no brief as the representative of this great army of public servants, but I yield to no man in my desire to grant unto its members the very best that the Public Treasury will afford, for every dollar thus invested is a dollar spent in the cause of justice and fair play.

I speak not as one who has just learned of the capabilities of our postal servants, nor as one who believes that favorable action at this time will make political capital for my particular party, but rather as one who has for 20 years past lived among and traveled with this body of exceedingly active and tremendously efficient employees, and by close contact learned of their splendid traits of character and their willingness and innate desire to serve their country to the very best of their ability.

Men of great ability to vision America in all its glory and portray its wonderful possibilities and expectations in the future have stood where I now stand and have well-nigh rocked the very foundations of the Capitol as they have told of our wonderful success as a Nation.

They have pictured, in language which has roused the world, our country's birth and marvelous growth from the famous Boston Tea Party to its present leadership of civilization, and we have applauded to the very echo every word they have uttered and have agreed with every thought which they have expressed, but, colleagues, did it ever occur to you that very much of this greatness which we have achieved, this leadership which we have attained, this wonderful success which has come to us in such large portion, was directly due to the faithfulness and efficiency of our postal servants? Did you ever stop to think how small this Nation would have been, how unimportant its business and social life, how separated we would have been one from the other, had our great Postal Service failed to function properly? Do you not realize that our great industries employing their millions of human souls, our great marts of trade and commerce moving with machine-like rhythm, all of our social and religious activities which have so much to do with our daily comfort and happiness, would cease and shrivel up were our postal servants to fail us? How, then, can we hesitate or falter when we are asked only to grant unto these who form so important a part in our daily life the wherewithal to keep soul and body together while they assist in our success?

Travel with me for a little while and view some of the conditions under which these faithful public servants labor. I will take you into some of our great cities where clerk and carrier find their daily toil.

Long, long before the break of day, the flickering light in yonder humble abode is the silent announcement of the beginning of another day's struggle for some clerk or letter carrier. While you and I, because of our good fortune, slumber on and dream of the good things of life, these poor fellows are stumbling forth in the very night, whether that night be clear or cloudy, rainy or snowy, bleak or blustery, in order to get to their posts of duty in time to place before us our daily mail when we reach our office or other places of busine . Indeed, they do even more than this. They bring to the door of our very home messages from far away relatives and friends before we have thought of leaving our inviting firesides. They begin our day for us and they still labor on even after you and I have returned to our domiciles to enjoy the comforts of home life and the companionship of our loved ones. Surely, ours would be a desolate existence were we to be shorn of the help and assistance of the postal employee.

Through storms of winter and the terrible heat of summer these public servants never fail us. True, blizzards may blast the operation of railroad trains and street cars, telegraph and telephone services may become greatly disordered by the sudden gusts of wind or heavy weight of ice and sleet, but whatever the weather we look for the letter carrier and are seldom if ever disappointed. Do you wonder, then, that master and servant, capitalist and capitalized, great and small, all sing the praises of men like these?

I have been particularly impressed during the last few weeks as I have read the letters coming in large number from my constituents urging me to lend a hand and raise my voice in behalf of these, the most poorly paid of our public servants. Great captains of industry, whose every moment is demanded in the management of the affairs over which they preside, have found time to write in praise and commendation and, notwithstanding their urgent desire for reduced taxation, have made an exception in the case of postal employees and asked me to vote for a proper recognition of the faithfulness which they daily display. Widows and orphans, whose homes have been made desolate by the departure of the breadwinner, are urging me to not forget the letter carrier who brings to their doors the only sunshine of the day. Civic bodies, organized and operating for the upbuilding and advancement of whole communities, have not forgotten to add to the almost momentary appeal to do justice by our postal servants. Ministers and memberships of large religious organizations have let me know in what high regard they hold these efficient carriers of the daily mail, and thus far I have not received one letter asking me to vote against giving a higher wage to these deserving men.

What I have said about our postal clerks and letter carriers is equally true about those who travel over the steel rails or flivver through the highways of our countryside in order that you and I, as well as the rest of mankind, may keep in daily touch with the rest of the world. The trials and tribulations and the "trimming" of daily expenditures to meet the demands of home and fireside and the welfare of loved ones is as evident here and just as necessary as in the case of postal employees in the large cities.

Let me emphasize another fact, gentlemen, which ought to impress you with the necessity for speedy and favorable action on our part: The value of a dollar to-day, when it has to compete with the high cost of living, is nowhere near 100 cents; and when we speak of paying a postal employee $1,800 per annum we are really only giving him that which will buy $1,080 worth of goods, as compared with a few years ago. So that a bill providing for a maximum of $2,400 per year is only giving the postal servant a spending certificate of $1,440 with which to buy uniforms, pay high rent, and to feed, clothe, and educate his children. Is that too much compensation for those who have so much to do with our daily welfare?

And right here, my colleagues, I want to call your attention to another thing which, because of somebody's neglect, is causing our postal employees to lose their health in addition to being compelled to live on starvation wages. Poor pay means poor food, poor clothing, and poor housing, and these in themselves are enough to destroy the ambition of any man and make him wonder whether it is worth while to struggle on in his efforts to do the right thing by his Government; but to be placed on inadequate wages and then be compelled to labor in an insanitary and unhealthy office is almost criminal—certainly a disgrace to this great Republic. Every human being must have a reasonable amount of breathing space in order to retain health and vigor, and every human being working for Uncle Sam has a perfect right to expect decent surroundings; but, gentlemen, I fear we have sadly neglected our duty in regard to this matter when we have considered our postal servants. Results—many sick and many others dying, simply because of a lack of proper air space in which to work. Let me show you the appalling situation in this respect to be found in many of our leading post offices. I submit for the RECORD the following statistics, which I beg that you read and digest, for surely after you have looked over this situation there can be no doubt of your desire to relieve our faithful servants of such deplorable working conditions.

Following is a list of buildings owned by the Federal Government showing abnormal congestion in post-office workrooms. These offices are arranged in the order of the number of square feet of space per employee at peak period, based on the number of square feet of space in the workroom proper. The space includes that occupied by furniture and equipment.

Mr. Chairman, the people of this country do not desire us to continue the deplorable financial status of our postal servants. On the contrary, they would sincerely applaud any efforts which we may undertake to do the right thing in this matter. All over America our citizens are making known their desire that we vote a living wage for postal employment, and we would be sadly neglectful of our public duty did we not heed this clarion call. I do not believe there is among us a single Member who has not heard from back home concerning this proposed legislation, and I venture to make the further statement, without fear of contradiction, that not one of us has been asked to vote against any proposed increase in the pay of our postal employees. On the contrary, from every direction has come the call that we make haste to grant financial relief and to improve working conditions for these faithful public servants. Editorially, all of our great newspapers are urging that we go forward in this movement to ameliorate deplorable conditions in our Postal Service. I herewith submit a few of these editorials for the edification of any doubting Thomases among us. They are but a fair sample of the hundreds which may be submitted. The first I read comes from that more-than-a-million-circulation New York Evening Journal:

Some idea of the injustice under which the men and women in the Postal Service have been laboring may be gleaned by reading what former Assemblyman Thomas E. Willmott has to say in a letter which he has written to the Evening Journal.

Willmott has been heart and soul in this fight for over a year and has spoken before various civic organizations, arousing their interest and securing the adoption of resolutions indorsing the fight. These, along with fat petitions, have been sent rolling on their way to Washington.

In his letter Willmott says:

"The point in this whole fight is this: Are the men and women of the Postal Service deserving of this increase in wages which they are now asking?

"This can be answered by looking at the facts—the wages which they are now receiving, the work they do, and the increased duties which they have had loaded on them within the last 10 years, during which their pay has remained the same, while the cost of living has doubled and trebled.

"The post office has been rightly described as the 'biggest single business in the world.' The growth of postal receipts, representing in a fair measure the increase in the volume of business, has been in a ratio far in excess of the increase in numbers of clerks and carriers.

"For the closed fiscal year the per cent of increase in receipts was 9.89, for the number of clerks 2.06, and the number of carriers 1.64.

"The lack of sufficient appropriations to appoint the additional clerks and carriers required by the growth of the service, the consequent shortage of experienced help, and the necessity for curtailing expenditures for overtime resulted in a delay in the movement of the mails other than first class.

"As a result the men in the service are required to work overtime in order to keep the service up to the standard. Because Congress will not heed their cry for help, many workers leave the service, and the department, in consequence, is always short of experienced men.

"Nine years ago the Government added the parcel post to the department, taking over the work of express companies, increasing the volume of work to be done, but not the revenue, proportionately. Meanwhile, the department operates, through postal savings, the biggest savings bank in the world. The total deposits for the year 1922 were $140,430,167.

"The figures are those furnished by authentic statements of the department officials themselves, and it is on these that the clerks and carriers have their claim for an increase in the wage scale.

"The truth boiled down is that the department has not kept pace with economic conditions, and the sooner the United States through its Congress realizes this fact the better it will be for the service all around.

"While other industries and trades have granted increases to their employees to meet the rising tide of the living cost, these faithful workers are being held down to old wage rates and they are striving to keep body and soul together under the unequal conditions.

"The postal clerk must memorize streets, routes, locations of buildings, steamship lines, in cities, towns, and villages scattered all over the land. It takes him as long to get this system perfected as for other men to study law or medicine. And the only reward is that he may, if he is lucky to live that long, retire on an inadequate pension when he reaches the age of 70.

"What is said of the clerk on the inside may be said with equal or greater force of the carrier who does his share on the outside.

"All that these faithful workers ask is a square deal—a chance to compete, on equal terms, with fellow workers in other trades and industries.

"Their fight for recognition has been a long and hard one. They are very much heartened just now by the announcement that the patrolmen and firemen have come to their aid.

"It may be the signal for victory.

"These new champions have just won their own fight for a decent living wage.

"Let us hope they will bring success to the postal workers."

That tells the story without any further comment from us.

The clerks and carriers are trying to get along on the same pay they got years ago, and in that time the value of the dollar has been cut in half by the rising cost of living.

In other words, it is as if their wages were reduced by half, while heavier burdens were imposed upon them and the revenue of the department has been increased.

It looks on the face of it as if the Congress has put Uncle Sam in the light of a thankless slave driver who is crushing the most faithful employees in his service.

There are others equally as strong and just as representative of the thought and desires of the communities they hail from. The Pittsburgh Gazette:

Cheap labor is, in the end, dear labor. This has been so thoroughly demonstrated that wide-awake business men have ceased to dispute about it. There always will be disagreements with respect to the adequacy of compensation for services in particular instances, but the principle stated is settled, at least where private enterprise is concerned. It should be settled definitely with respect to public employment.

Recognition of this truth makes the solid foundation for the movement become popular for increasing the salaries of postal employees. Organizations of business men throughout the land, national bodies, and the local organizations of which they are composed have given their unreserved approval to the Edge-Kelly bill pending in Congress which provides for a minimum of $2,000 and a maximum of $2,400 a year for post-office clerks and letter carriers. The Chamber of Commerce of Pittsburgh and of other cities, and the Chamber of Commerce of the United States are among the organizations well qualified to pronounce on the proposition which have adopted resolutions calling upon House and Senate to pass and the President to sign this act of justice to public servants whose fidelity and efficiency are proverbial.

The postal employees are not only inadequately paid; there is not offered to them opportunities for advancement, which are automatically provided in private business, and which there constitute an important incentive to faithful performance of duty and make a substantial basis of stability in organization. Postal employees are expected to carry on for sheer love of country, and they do. But they are entitled to the simple justice this bill provides.

There is before the present session of Congress an unusual number of subjects of first-rate importance. These rightly will claim a large share of the time of both House and Senate. But there can be no excuse acceptable to the country for failure to authorize higher pay and other just provisions for the postal employees. The bill should be passed without unnecessary delay.

[From the Wisconsin News.]

The question of adequate pay for our letter carriers and postal clerks is again before Congress.

It is the old question whether this great and wealthy Government, that can lose billions in war graft without turning a hair, is prepared to do justice to the hardest working and poorest paid of its employees.

Four years ago, when last this question was up, the postal commission recommended certain increases based on the rise in living cost. But Congress assured the men and women of the post office that the prices of necessities would shortly return to pre-war levels and granted them only a fraction of the requested raise.

Thus clerks and carriers had to be content with salaries of $1,400 for the first grade, $1,600 for the second, and $1,800 for the third; while two grades of special clerks received, respectively, $1,900 and $2,000.

But even this small compensation for arduous and specialized services is not paid in full. From each salary there is deducted 2½ per cent for the retirement fund. So the actual cash received by the rank and file of postal workers ranges from $1,365 to $1,755, or $26.25 and $33.75 per week.

And there is this further handicap: No matter how efficient a clerk may prove himself, there is no such thing as promotion to the better-paid special grades through service.

For four years now our postal employees have waited for the fulfillment of the assurance given them by Congress, and you know they have waited in vain.

There has been a slight decline in commodity prices, but nothing like a return to pre-war levels. In fact, the rise in living cost has been so much greater than their increase in compensation that their salaries, in point of buying power, have been reduced instead of raised.

The resultant economic loss to them and their families can never be made good. The least that can be done—and that must be done in honor and justice—is to increase the salaries of these men and women so that they will not be less, in real purchasing value, than they were in 1913.

That is what the appropriation bill now before Congress undertakes to do.

It would fix the salaries for the three grades of clerks and carriers at $2,000, $2,200, and $2,400, respectively, and that of the two grades of special clerks at $2,500 and $2,600. And it would also make possible promotion to these higher grades.

We believe that the American people emphatically approve of this bill. In 1920 their overwhelming demand on Congress for the increases then recommended was largely responsible for their partial grant at least.

Now, as then, the Wisconsin News urges every good citizen to write to his Representatives in Washington demanding this belated act of justice.

In sheer human obligation we owe that much to the man who calls twice daily at our door, be it storm or shine; whose memory, accuracy, and judgment are ever alert for our benefit; whose courtesy and helpfulness are unfailing.

And we owe it to those other postal employees within doors, 70 per cent of whom work at night, sacrificing both family and social life that our interests may be served; and all of whom exercise their multiform knowledge and expert training at high speed and tension throughout the weary hours.

It is a crying shame that these employees of a rich and even prodigal Government—employees upon whose honesty, loyalty, industry, efficiency, resourcefulness, special fitness, and expert equipment the success of a fundamental and essential business of that Government is dependent—it is, we say, a crying shame, and more than that, a rank injustice that such public servants should for so long have been grossly underpaid, should have had an increase of but $400 in maximum salary during the past half century.

It is for the people of Milwaukee and of Wisconsin to do their part in making good that far-reaching wrong, and we doubt not that they will.

Let them write to the Congressmen without fail, and tell them, in no uncertain terms, that the American people will no longer tolerate a Postal Service rendered at the expense of underpaid responsibility and toil.

[From the Milwaukee Sentinel.]

Wide sympathy and support have been enlisted for the post-office employees, who are asking Congress for a long-deferred salary revision in order to cope with the cost of living.

Whatever Congress may think of the merits of the Kelly bill, embodying the proposed salary increases for postal clerks and mail carriers, Congress can not refuse to take the question of an increase for these workers into immediate and favorable consideration.

Their plea is entitled to an early and respectful hearing, and it is our impression that the increases urged in the Kelly bill are by no means exaggerated.

The postal workers justly argue that they are not demanding charity, but simply equality of treatment with labor outside the Government service.

It is needless to dwell on humanitarian considerations. Everybody is familiar with the hard work and the relatively poor pay of the mail carrier. His case is readily appreciated by a friendly public, while the plight of the postal clerks and other office workers may be less familiar to patrons of the post office.

The point for Congress to consider is not merely justice for our postal servants but also the maintenance of the efficiency of the service. Postmaster Piasecki testifies that "the highest possible standard can not be reached as long as wages do not measure up to the requirements of the position."

This consideration applies particularly to postal office workers who have no hope of promotion. Experienced clerks, seeing their earning capacity drop below the level of wages in private business, will naturally be tempted out of the service, and the temptation is strongest with the most ambitious and valuable workers.

The country can not afford to see the Postal Service crippled by an inadequate rate of pay. As an employer of labor Uncle Sam would be practicing the wrong kind of economy by failure to adjust his pay roll so as to meet the competition of private employment. The importance of the postal department demands at least a scale of pay capable of insuring continued efficiency in this indispensable branch of Government service.

[From the Times-Herald, Dallas, Tex.]

Postal employees are receiving less pay to-day than in 1912, according to a comparison of wages and increased living costs prepared by workers in the Dallas post office. They, in common with others throughout the United States, have petitioned Congress for a readjustment of their salaries, with a reasonable and well-deserved increase in the present rate of compensation. A House resolution to this effect has been introduced and hearings on it are expected to begin soon.

In view of the fact that the present maximum for carriers and clerks, who begin work at $1,400 a year, is only $1,800, relief is obviously necessary. Considering the present cost of living in Dallas, and similar conditions existing elsewhere, it is difficult to conceive of properly trained men being attracted to or kept in the mail service by such financial remuneration.

Naturally the service suffers, and in like measure the public. * * *

The habits, standard of living, education, and environments of Government employees and those depending upon them must, of necessity, reflect credit or discredit upon the Government of which they are an intimate and responsible part. It is for these reasons that the Congress of the United States can not longer afford to ignore its just obligations to the Government employees. Ill-fed, shabbily clothed, poorly housed, and miserably underpaid Government employees can not and will not render efficient service. They can not add anything to the wealth or progress of the country. They can not properly equip their children for the battle of life, nor can they contribute the quality of children to insure and safeguard the future of this Republic in the generations to come.

The public never hesitates to complain when letters go astray or are delivered late; and perhaps in no other department of the Government is prompt, efficient service more necessary. In the case of the postal employees, the right kind of service, to say nothing of the much-used term "living wage," call for increased pay. Public opinion will approve favorable action on the House bill now pending.

[From the Fort Worth Star-Telegram.]

* * * * * * *

The present wage scale is shameful, and in addition promotes inefficiency. As long as it remains, the best men in the service will have their eyes constantly turned toward more remunerative and less exacting jobs in other lines for which their training qualifies them.

Perhaps in no other industry is the labor "turnover" so high as in the larger post offices of the country. In the Chicago office, for instance, where the allotment is 6,010 clerks, more than 8,000 have resigned since 1920. This is a labor turnover of 133 per cent.

Private business couldn't run efficiently on that basis. Nor can a Government department.

[From the Oskaloosa (Iowa) Herald.]

It is a fact generally admitted by the higher authorities in the Postal Service, reiterated by employees in the service, and emphasized in the daily experience of persons using the service that a lack of sufficient high-grade help in the Post Office Department is a growing handicap. This lack of help is attributable almost entirely to one thing—insufficient pay. Capable men are not being attracted to the service as they were some years ago. Much of the work is being put upon the shoulders of temporary workers, untrained workers, substitutes, and other inefficient men. The necessary result is a deterioration of service.

Such a deterioration is a serious handicap to innumerable lines of business. Delay in delivery of letters, parcels, or other items of mail frequently may mean loss of contracts, business misunderstandings, and other damaging effects. The situation ought to be corrected in the general cause of business stimulation and prosperity.

It can be corrected to a large extent by the simple process of passing the Kelly bill, H. R. 4123, which is now before Congress. That bill is designed to raise the scale of salaries to a point which will give regular workers in the Postal Service a reasonable income, and thereby attract efficient and reliable men to the work. The salaries it suggests are still small, ranging from $2,000 to $2,600.

[From the Sentinel, Carlisle, Pa.]

A bill providing for pay increases in the Postal Service, including clerks and carriers, has been prepared for introduction in the lower House of Congress. An earnest effort is to be made to pass it, and as it is a proper measure it ought to be passed. General observation will show anyone that postal clerks and carriers have not much opportunity to take up side lines to aid them in meeting the cost of living, and their pay, while reasonably good, is not equal to the competence earned by men and women of like ability in other lines of employment. It is a notorious fact that the Government has been niggardly in its pay all through the civil-service list, in other branches as well as the Postal Department. The Postal Service offers those who engage in it steady work and security in their jobs, but these advantages do not make up for small pay.

[From the Home News, New Brunswick, N. J.]

Whether Uncle Sam's post office operates at a profit or at a loss is of little consequence to the public, since whichever way the balance swings the money comes ultimately from the public. The Postal Department is a public institution dependent upon public patronage. Its receipts come from the public, and if its expenditures exceed those receipts the public pays the deficit in taxes.

Yet the average American citizen is a good business man and is intolerant of deficits. To him the word "deficit" is a synonym for "failure," or at least "poor business." There are reasons to believe that the public should rather maintain the Postal Service on postage pennies as it goes along than in Federal taxes after the books are closed for the year. Not that it makes any difference in the end but just because deficits and living beyond one's means are antagonistic to certain typical American traits.

Recognizing these American sentiments, it is not surprising that the public was greatly gratified that the Post Office Department had a deficit at the end of the last year amounting to $30,000,000 less than that of the preceding year. The war taught Americans to talk glibly of millions and billions, but a reduction in operating expenses of $30,000,000 will always represent economy and efficiency in America as well as elsewhere.

Former Postmaster General Work and his successor, Postmaster General New, their staff at Washington, and their assistants in the post offices across the length and breadth of the land are deserving of and will receive the thanks of the public for the economy and efficiency represented in this reduction in the Postal Department's deficit.

But this gratification should not be taken as an indication that the public approves of the reduction of the deficit at the expense of the clerks and letter carriers who are receiving small compensation for the service rendered. These employees are entitled to higher salaries and the Post Office Department should decide upon some plan of operations whereby the present service can be maintained with better pay given the employees. That the department has been able to reduce the deficit is largely due to the efficient service rendered by the clerks and carriers, and recognition of that fact should be made in dollars and cents by the Government.

[From the Philadelphia Inquirer.]

MORE PAY FOR POST-OFFICE WORKERS.

Better pay for post-office employees is so obviously a matter of justice that Colonel Kemp's advice to his staff to press for it is timely. Unless something is done while the appropriations are pending, postponement will be inevitable. The Government is notoriously slow in doing justice to its servants in this respect, though it can be lavish enough in other directions. The time is one for economy, of course, and many things otherwise expedient must be postponed in consequence. But there is no economy in paying less than a living wage. Salaries in the post office have not begun to keep pace with the cost of living.

What gives the clerks and carriers a stronger claim upon consideration is the fact that they have not allowed their discontent to demoralize the service. It may be doubted if the increase in labor per man has been as great in any other department or in any private employment. The growth of the business has been so marked that the revenues have practically doubled in 15 years. Yet the working force is hardly 25 per cent larger. This means that the individual members have much more put upon them than formerly. It is surprising that the morale of the force has not suffered more. But there will be an inevitable loss of efficiency as the older employees retire, since the present salaries can not attract to the service the kind of men it needs.

The primary aim of the Post Office Department is to give service, not to make money. It does not appear, however, that higher pay for employees would mean a serious deficit. The employees themselves believe that a very slight readjustment of the parcel-post rates would make the department self-sustaining, even with higher salaries. If this could be done without imposing upon the business of the country a too-heavy burden there could be no great objection to it. But something must be done in the name of justice for a hard-working and faithful body of Government employees.

[From the Okmulgee Daily Times.]

While wages have been moving up and up during the past eight years, there is one class of public servants which has enjoyed only in the slightest measure the satisfaction that comes with wage increases.

That class is the postal employees.

Artisans who, in many instances, have forced wage scales up to an unreasonable point have not hesitated to use the weapons at hand to force wages still higher when they reasoned that higher wages were coming to them. But here is a class of public servants whose work is indispensable but who have been given only the scantiest recognition by the Government in return for faithful service. While costs have been mounting they have been forced to continue at work under increasingly trying living conditions without a commensurate advance in salaries.

A bill is now pending in Congress which is designed to relieve this unfair condition. The bill has been framed with an idea of more nearly equalizing the salaries in keeping with local conditions so that no particular class of postal employees shall have an advantage over another or so that no division of employees in one class shall have an advantage over employees of the same division or classification working in localities where the cost of living is proportionally lower.

If such a measure as that which is now pending could be submitted to the people for their approval, it would deserve unanimous support. For it is now and has been for a long time a matter of public concern that postal employees are underpaid. Civic organizations can well afford to indorse the bill and make known their action to their Congressman.

Mr. Chairman, letter carriers are skilled employees, skilled to a very high degree of efficiency due to the requirements of their everyday work.

These duties are hard and exacting and require men of exceptional physical and mental qualifications. In order to attain a position as letter carrier a man must take a competitive civil service examination and pass with such a percentage above 70 that he procures a high standing on the eligible register. In addition he is required to pass a physical examination certified to by a reputable physician which closely parallels those required for enlistment in the Army and Navy.

He is first appointed a "substitute" for which he is paid at the rate of 60 cents per hour, only for the time he is actually employed, which may range from only one hour per day to eight hours per day if he works at all. After serving on an average of three years as substitute "learning the business," he may finally be appointed as junior letter carrier at a salary of $1,400 a year and assigned to a regular route. He has to report on regular schedule time, as early as 6 o'clock a. m., and route his mail for delivery or collect the mail from street letter boxes, and after attending to multitudinous duties which his position requires he starts to make his deliveries, and if he fails to be on time the patrons on his route complain of the delay whether the mail be heavy or light or the weather be fair or foul. He must be an encyclopedia of postal information, as his patrons depend on him as he is the only member of the postal organization many of them ever see.

His work is constantly supervised, and he is required to perform a stated amount of work per minute in order to meet the requirements of the efficiency standard.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LANKFORD].

Mr. LANKFORD. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I quote from to-day's issue of the Washington Herald the following extracts from an editorial:

The Teapot Dome scandal is bad enough in itself. But if it stood alone and without a likeness in our national life the evil scandal could be soon wiped out, with no lasting harm done.

The deplorable thing is that this instance of bribery and of profiteering at the cost of the people is not alone or singular. Bribery is everywhere at work. The virus has infected every part of the body politic.

Again I read from the same editorial as follows:

The political immorality which has forecast the decadence of nations throughout all history is beginning to rear its head in our own United States.

The vast wealth produced annually by the people is an inexhaustible source of plunder, and the plundering never ceases, day or night. We are all plundered, alike when we work or play, when we wake and when we sleep. No one escapes, and the poor and the hard working are robbed as ruthlessly as the well to do.

This constant profiteering, this constant plundering, is based upon bribery, direct or indirect, of accessible politicians.

Also the following from the same item:

The curtain behind which the profiteers and public plunderers do their unceasing rascally work has been lifted for one brief glimpse of one particular instance of the almost universal rascality and plundering.

It is to make these profiteers and public plunderers richer and richer; it is to sustain the whole vast fabric of bribery and plunder and corrupt politics that you people pay when your rents are raised, when the cost of food and clothing constantly increases, when your tax bills are higher and higher, when each year and each month calls for more money to meet the cost of doing business and the cost of decent living.

If we would save our country, preserve our liberties, we must go deeper than a mere surface examination of one scandalous job of public plundering.

We must start to make all public plundering difficult, if not impossible.

We must go to the root of this gigantic evil, and the root of it is the plain fact that government had drifted out of the hands of the citizenship and into the hands of powerful financial cliques.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I indorse the sentiment of these extracts. The Teapot Dome investigation is all useless unless we learn a lesson from its shocking revelations, and unless a determined effort is made as a result of this investigation to "clean house" and have a better, cleaner, purer government in the future.

An awful experience is ofttimes turned to a blessing in disguise when a lesson is learned which starts an improvement of the awful conditions which brought about the experience.

Mr. Chairman, it may be that "To the victor belongs the spoils" but in "the land of the free and the home of the brave" there ought not to be so blamed much spoils. The spoilsmen of the past killed men, women, and children in order to rob, plunder, and carry away the spoils. If they were caught they were shot or hanged. To-day the spoilsmen without any excuse rob men, women, and children of their reputation, which they built up during a lifetime and which is their all. They kill innocent men, women, and children and drive them to suicide by depriving them of their rights and giving the spoils to the so-called victors, and yet the spoilsmen of to-day sit in high places and boast of their authority in this grand and glorious Government of ours. Many of the common people of our Nation are filling premature graves because of legislation which makes the rich richer and the poor poorer, and yet to-day the multimillionaires absolutely control the United States Treasury, and by their places on leading committees in Congress they control, or attempt to control, all legislation. Yet is is said "To the victor belongs the spoils."

Edicts are issued by the multimillionaire Secretary of the Treasury and readily indorsed by the powers that be. He says no cash bonus is to be paid by the big rich and there is a most determined effort for no cash bonus to be paid by the big rich. The profiteer is to be protected. The returned soldier is to be rejected. "To the victor belongs the spoils" it is urged. This administration of millionaires says maybe a bonus will be provided to be paid by a sales tax out of the pockets of the poor, or possibly some form of insurance will be permitted. They say if the soldiers get a bonus, let them and their fathers, mothers, brothers, and sisters pay it. The big rich must be let alone with theirs. For know ye not that "to the victor belongs the spoils."

The ex-service man neglected and rejected by the Government for which he fought takes a pistol and in a moment of despair ends it all. He thought he was a victor, but he found that a victor who makes or saves a nation is only one to be destroyed by the spoilsmen of the present who know no victors because of service to mankind, but only know as victors those who are political manipulators and who have campaign funds galore, whether rightfully obtained or not. Those who have profiteered most have most to keep, if possible. They are extremely anxious to be among the victors of a political party which recognizes wealth and political crookedness instead of honor and ability as tests of fitness to hold office. For they are firm believers in the theory that "to the victor belongs the spoils."

The multimillionaire Secretary of the Treasury Mellon said that he would like to be chairman of the select small committee to manipulate and shuffle the enormous foreign debt of billions of dollars so as to take care of the big banker, big rich, and men who have profiteered so as to be in the millionaire class. The Secretary gets what he wants, for now it is that "to the victor belongs the spoils." Of all funds ever raised the great common people are more interested in the money raised during the Great War than in any other. It came from people of every station of life. The widow, the orphan, and the poorest of the poor, all did their very best. A large part of the fund thus raised is now due us by foreign powers. That money is the common property of every American citizen. Yet it is being shuffled and manipulated as pleaseth a favored few who believe that "to the victor belongs the spoils."

A general tax bill was so drawn and passed by the last Republican Congress as to relieve the big rich of much of the burdens of taxation. The big rich either have contributed much campaign funds to the Republican Party or can do so when it will be much needed in future campaigns. The big rich are protected on the theory that "to the victor belongs the spoils." A tariff bill was enacted by the last Republican Congress to protect the profiteers and the concerns with big sacks of money who either did contribute heavily to past campaign funds of the Republican Party or are in position to contribute in the future when funds will be sorely needed to be used in convincing the consuming public that it was taxed for its own good. So it goes that "to the victor belongs the spoils." It is even provided in this tariff bill that the President have the power to increase or diminish duties as he sees proper. If men and women are deprived of offices because they do not subscribe to the Republican faith and do not contribute to Republican campaign funds, then why should not people who are not Republicans and do not help put up a slush fund be derived of the protection of a desired duty on goods in competition with goods they sell? If the President by Executive order and otherwise dishes out offices to Republicans because they are Republicans and leaves off others simply because they are not Republicans, then why not dish out the protective tariff soup to the Republicans who show their efficiency by a nice campaign contribution. "To the victor belongs the spoils" is being worked overtime.

Oh, it is said that men are being put out of office and Republicans are being put in "for the good of the service." It being known to all that he who serves the Republican Party is one who is "for the good of the service" and efficiency from a Republican standpoint is fully attained by the profiteer who puts up money for campaign purposes. The good of the service of the Republican Party must be maintained, regardless of the cost to the public. "To the victor belongs the spoils."

Mr. Chairman, this country is in a deplorable condition, with a party in power using the spoils system to the limit when the whole Nation is suffering the agonies of hell because of the lack of proper legislation and because those in power play politics while the Nation burns. Ah, Mr. Chairman, the party in power is worried more about the "good of the service" of the Republican Party than they are about "the good of the service" of the American people. They are worried infinitely more about efficiency of a man as a campaign or boodle contributor, or political manipulator, than they are worried about the efficiency of a man as a public servant. The Bureau of Printing and Engraving was turned upside down in violation of law and contrary to established rights of honorable men and women "for the good of the service of the Republican Party. The civil service system established by wise men of the past has been strangled and mangled and its very death threatened "for the good of the service" of the Republican Party. It has been proposed to make spoils of hundreds, yea, thousands, even millions, of positions in this Nation in order to dish out those rights to Republicans "for the good of the service" of the party.

"To the victor belongs the spoils." My God, to what extent is the spoils system going? The Veterans' Bureau is a hotbed of the spoils system for the good of the service, not of ex-service men but of the Republican Party. Is our entire postal system a seething caldron of spoils to be stirred with the paddle of political hatred "for the good of the service" of the Republican Party and not for the people? It is understood generally that Attorney General Daugherty is the chief of spoilsmen. He wants no civil-service system. He wants no merit system; he wants everything controlled by the spoils system. He wants the Department of Justice to become the department of spoils and wants to become the chief keeper, preserver, and protector of the spoils, of the victors for the good of the service of the Republican Party. It is easily understood why Daugherty does not want the merit system used in the selection of public officials.

He prefers the spoils system. He likes a system under which he and others like him can qualify. He has made the Department of Justice the department of spoils. It is no longer the Department of Justice; it is now the department of "just is." It is now being operated for the glory of Daugherty, the ignominy of the Republican Party, and to the shame of the Nation. A statement was carried in the newspapers the other day that Daugherty wanted the prohibition-enforcement service put under the Daugherty spoils "just is" department. He would like to dish out the large amount of money allowed for prohibition enforcement. The enforcement service would soon be a pretty kettle of fish with Daugherty trying to play politics with the service. The whole enforcement service is about to break down now, because many men are being put in the service for political reasons only.

It is now said that President Harding was misled into dismissing the employees of the Bureau of Printing and Engraving. I do not doubt this suggestion. That good man was misled every time he followed men like Daugherty. The Attorney General ought to be satisfied with spoils, but yet he wants more. He has spoiled and flyblown his position as a Cabinet member; he has spoiled and flyblown the Republican administration; and, if permitted, would make spoils of every right of the American people.

Ah, Mr. Chairman, why say so much about the Teapot Dome scandal; know ye not that "to the victor belongs the spoils"? The Teapot Dome transaction is larger, but no more corrupt than the sale of public offices for cash or to pay political debts. It is no worse than a profiteers' tariff for the big Republican rich, to the undoing, destruction, and even death of millions of the great consuming public. I repeat, it is no more corrupt to be influenced by money to sacrifice the interests of the American people in these oil properties than it is either under the guise of law or without lawful authority to take the hard-earned money of the consuming public by a profiteers' tariff and give it to the big corporations either for cash or to pay political debts. There is no longer in this country a protective tariff. It is now the profiteers' tariff. The Republican Party is still the G. O. P.; it is now the Grand Old Profiteer.

If the Republican Party follows much longer the leadership of such spoilsmen as Daugherty and continues to sell her party virtue for money and for political purposes, she will soon be without a single virtue. The Teapot Dome controversy can not be any more corrupt than the dishing out of offices solely and only for political reasons. It can not be more corrupt than the sale of rural routes and postmasterships in the South by negroes, which has been practiced by the Republicans for years. What can be more corrupt than the sale of Federal judgeships? Can you wonder why there is so much disrespect for law in the country when a Republican Congress makes so many laws to enable the rich to oppress the poor? When a Republican Congress helps the manufacturer of North and East to rob and destroy the consuming public, is there not reason for the victims complaining and losing faith in the justice of laws made here? How are we to expect obedience to law when the judgeships whereby law is to be enforced are sold for money or to pay political debts?

Political rottenness evidenced by a negro selling postmasterships seems to have a good odor to Republican noses. Why now turn these same noses up so much at the odor of the Teapot Dome situation? For my part, I like the aroma of the Teapot quite as well, and in fact much better, than I like the odor of a Republican buck negro selling public offices during a Republican administration. A Republican, black, greasy, in the person of Link Johnson, generally sells Republican patronage in Georgia. The present administration has deprived Link of his "green peas" in this respect so far, and I commend the administration; but it is said that Link claims now to be a special and trusted friend of President Coolidge. It looks much like Link is to soon again be operating "for the good of the service."

Ah, Mr. Chairman, what are we coming to? Congress is stripping the States of all rights. All power is being centralized here in Washington, and the power of a few men, appointees under a spoils system, is being made tremendous.

The time is at hand when men who never saw my State, men whom my people did not vote for and had no chance to vote for, men not in sympathy with the traditions and American impulses of my people, yea, men who do not like my people, hold in the hollow of their hands the power to control almost every activity of my people. They can and are destroying the rights, liberties, and lives of my people. Talk about free representative government. Every centralization of power is a blow at liberty and is the undermining of our form of government. Every enlargement of the power of men who hold office by appointment is a weakening of representative government. The spoils system inevitably leads to corruption and anarchy.

Centralize enough power here, carry the spoils system to its fullest extent, and give the Executive sufficient power to enforce his decrees and you have the worst government since the beginning of the human race. If we are to save this wonderful Government which our forefathers gave us let us return to the old teachings of the fathers before we shall have lost all.

It is said that "experience is a dear school, but fools will learn in no other." It seems that many people are so wedded to the spoils system as to not even be willing to learn in the school of experience. The Tea Pot Dome scandal ought to cause an awakening of the public and a condemnation of everything that smells like "spoils."

Is Congress to eventually take from the States and the people in the States every vestige of authority to control local affairs? Is Congress then to abdicate its right to legislate and give to department heads, bureau chiefs, and other appointive officials all the right to legislate and then let these officials appointed under a spoils system dish out rules, regulations, and laws under a spoils system, thus controlling all rights of all the people under a system of spoils, rottenness, and corruption?

Is every official of the public soon to be appointed under the spoils system, and are those spoilsmen to control every activity of this once free people? Are freemen to be cast down and spoilsmen to be enthroned? Is liberty a thing of the past, and political corruption th present dominating force?

Is this Nation, which can never know defeat by the armies and navies of the world from the outside, to rot unto death of political corruption and of the awful poison of the spoilsmen on the inside? This Nation can not long endure unless it purges itself of every vestige of the corrupt spoils system. The American people to-day enjoy probably not over one-tenth of the liberty for which our forefathers fought. To what extent will Congress go? Will we turn back before it is too late?

We are working the destruction of our Nation when we concentrate too much power here to be exercised by people not elected by the people but by people holding office the very commission to which is tainted with the odor of spoils. We ought to leave the people to control their own affairs. We ought to mind our own business and let the people manage their business. We should fight for more freedom and greater human rights, not for less. We should legislate for people to control their own legitimate activities and not for spoilsmen to dominate their every move. There is no one thing that Congress or the President can do which will so vitally serve the people and so fully guarantee the future safety of this Nation as to end for all time the present deplorable and baneful spoils system. Will we act for the right? Will we save our Nation by reestablishing not only in name but in fact every principle for which our forefathers fought and which are embodied in our Declaration of Independence and in our Constitution, and which are placed by the Almighty in the heart of every free man?

May an all-wise God grant unto us here in Congress the foresight to see the certain destruction toward which we are drifting and the power to turn aside and save all before the final hour of doom shall have come. [Applause.]

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. LILLY].

Mr. LILLY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, we all regret and try as much as possible to refrain from thinking of the great World War and the troubles and tribulations connected with it, but we can not forget the time when our beloved Nation was threatened by a European monarch, when our demands and entreaties had been ignored by Germany and our American lives and property ruthlessly destroyed by the deadly submarine, when it was necessary for us to immediately raise, equip, and send to Europe an army to subdue the great army of Germans to set the world once more free from this danger, and that it was then, my friends, that we called forth the young manhood of our country from the farms, mines, shops, railroads, and lumber camps, and sent them across the dangerous, submarine-infested waters to a far off field of battle. Never can we forget the time when our boys were getting together at the railroad stations and the seaports to depart for the battle ground. It was then that our hearts went out in devotion to them for their patriotism; it was then that we bade them farewell and Godspeed and assured them that when the great conflict was over and they returned that nothing that this Nation possessed would be too good for them. They were taken from their employment, with wages ranging from $5 to $25 a day, and forced into the military service of the country at the pitiful sum of $30 a month. In addition to that, we required and urged them to take insurance to protect their lives; after the insurance premiums were deducted, the few toilet necessities and tobacco purchased, there was nothing left.

They made a record for themselves as gallant soldiers; some returned, but many fell on Flanders and other battle fields of Europe. Now, we are called upon by the few that were fortunate enough to return to give them an adjusted compensation; the amount is small—nothing commensurate with the services rendered. It is simply a token of our appreciation for their services. But, to my surprise, there are many of you that are opposing it. Can we call ourselves patriots; can we call ourselves Americans when we fail to show our appreciation for their services?

We are not establishing a precedent by doing this. Following every war in which this country has been engaged there has been given the soldiers an allotment of money, land, or something to show our appreciation. Now that the wealth of this country is greater than ever before; now that we hold ourselves out to the world as being a great democracy; now that we hold ourselves out as a Christian Nation, a Nation that wants to help those in distress, a Nation that boasts of entering the war largely for the purpose of "making the world safe for democracy," shall we be so selfish in the face of these boasting assertions as to deny compensation to our own soldiers? Gentlemen, it is ridiculous; it is dangerous. None of us is sufficiently prophetic to say that we will never have another war. Wars can be brought on rapidly and almost unexpectedly. This is a small, small favor that our soldiers are asking. If we turn a deaf ear to their appeal, could we go forth and appeal to them in another war for their services and patriotism? Could they not, and justly so, reply to us that they had fought one war for us and we did not appreciate it, and they did not feel disposed to fight another? What would be the result? It has been proven that the morale of the soldier is one of the strongest factors in winning battles, and if we deny them this adjusted compensation we can not deny but that it would have a great deal to do with the morale of any future soldiers.

You people that oppose it talk about the condition of the Nation's Treasury. In other words, you try to plead poverty. That, in my judgment, is a very poor excuse. Just the other day on the floor of this House you passed a bill by a majority of three to one to strengthen the Coast Guard by building and equipping new ships, hiring additional sailors, and making an appropriation for same, which carries with it a lump sum of about $14,000,000, with an additional $13,000,000 annually for its upkeep thereafter, when we have ships of all kinds now lying around the coasts and in docks with barnacles growing upon them from nonuse and gradually decaying and rotting away. This expenditure was unnecessary, and I am glad that I voted against it. You recently passed an appropriation bill of several hundred thousand dollars for the Howard University, a colored religious school, in which the Government has no interest whatever; and there are numerous other unnecessary expenditures that I have witnessed here in the last few days. Now, when a just appropriation and expenditure is asked to in part pay and show our appreciation for the services of our soldiers, you cry out that the Nation and the Nation's Treasury can not stand the expense.

This compensation should be a cash bonus. It is argued by some that this would be unwise and that it would hurt the financial condition of the country and that the soldiers would waste the money instead of making profitable investments. This is not a logical argument by any means. Perhaps some of the soldiers would not spend the money wisely, but I contend that the majority of them would spend this money for education, for a home, or for some necessity that would assist them in their trades or callings. But, however they might spend it, it would get back into circulation throughout the country and would have a tendency to revive, strengthen, and help business, which is very much needed in the present period of depression and deflation.

Gentlemen, in the name of humanity, is there anything that is more vital to us than the safety and preservation of our Nation and its institutions, and who knows but that we owe this to the soldiers of the World War? We can not gauge what the results would have been had we not entered the war. I appeal to you in the name of humanity and sane legislation to vote for this adjusted compensation. [Applause.]

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COOK].

Mr. COOK. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, I desire to take the time of the House for a few moments to briefly present a question for consideration, which seems to me is more important to the country than all others combined. In saying this, I do not mean to disparage the importance of any other public question. This question is the condition of the farmers of the West and Northwest. I have in mind, especially, the great grain and stock raising portions of our country lying to the west and northwest. Having due regard for the other sections, in my opinion, this comes very near being the proverbial "garden spot" of the United States. Its soil can produce enough food to feed all of the people under the Stars and Stripes. While referring to this section alone, what is said as to its condition, could be to some extent applied to the other agricultural sections of the country. Far be it from my purpose to misstate the facts or unduly magnify the condition of these tillers of the soil. There has been doubt, unrest, and uncertainty in the minds of the farmers of this section for the past several years. These conditions, instead of growing better, are growing worse. It is time that Congress should take up and discuss the whole question, find out the facts, and apply such remedies as are within its power to relieve the condition and restore the farmer to his proper place as a part of our great system of production.

We have recently closed a long discussion of the question of reducing the income and excise taxes. After all of the flood of argument, the array of figures and tables running into the millions, all the theories as to the probable effect of the various provisions of the bill, and rates of the several plans, the simple question which overshadowed all others was whose taxes should be reduced—those with the large incomes or those with the small incomes. Every Member of this House was in favor of reducing taxes to the lowest possible limit consistent with the needs of the Treasury, but there was room for an honest difference of opinion as to the persons who should receive the benefits of this reduction. Although there was a strenuous effort in some quarters to make it appear that there were some other questions involved, yet the whole debate centered around that point. The result was a compromise measure. This is quite often the case in legislation, as well as in the other affairs of life. The bill has been sent to the Senate, and if it is ultimately approved and becomes a law the people will then have the opportunity of studying its final provisions and determining for themselves the merits of the bill as compared with the other plans and rates proposed. Common experience in the everyday affairs of life has long since demonstrated that it is wise to withhold final opinion on any given public question until the whole question can be presented, not only by those who are directly affected or interested but by those who are disinterested.

It seemed to be conceded in the debate that by the time the farmer paid his State and local taxes and his other necessary expenses that very few would have anything left on which to pay income taxes, and that about the only benefit he would receive from the bill would be the reduction of the excise taxes on his automobile truck and the accessories for the repair of his automobile and truck and the repeal of the stamp tax on notes. These changes were made in the bill after it reached the House. This small reduction still depends on whether it remains in the bill. In other words, it was a bill primarily to reduce the taxes of those having incomes above the exemptions. The people can easily determine how many will come within that class.

I desire to call attention to the fact that there is another phase of the question of taxation which did not enter into the discussion. To my mind, it is a very important one to the farmer, and must not be overlooked in dealing with his condition and in considering measures for his relief. That question is the tribute which he is paying to the other industries of the country. The reduction of this tribute is one of the first steps which must be taken in bringing about any substantial or permanent reduction of his taxes. I am not speaking now of the burden of State and local taxation. That is paid into the county treasury, and the General Government does not receive any part of it. However, I am speaking of the taxes which are concealed in the price of nearly every article which the farmer buys. These exorbitant prices and the high transportation rates are a tax on his income far in excess of all of the other taxes which he pays. The transportation rates not only increase the price of everything which he buys but they decrease the price of everything he sells.

In considering the condition of the farmer we must also take into account his situation as compared with other industries. The great corporations which control the railroads and natural resources, such as coal, oil, iron, copper, and so forth, are all organized so as to control the prices of their products. This is also true of many other industries. They are so combined as to be able to control the prices and sale of their products and can act practically as one man. These monopolies can concentrate their power and influence at any given point very quickly. I shall give a few examples: The tariff enables the woolen and other trusts to make immense profits; recently it was proposed to grant a subsidy to the Shipping Trust; the railroads have been assured certain profits; patents have created great monopolies; the Steel Trust has its "Pittsburgh plus"; we have the Standard and other oil monopolies, the Wall Street Money Trust, the Insurance Trust, the Meat Packers' Trust, the Coal Trust, and I might name many others. Little progress can be made in a proper understanding and solution of the situation by those who refuse to recognize the existence and power of these industries in controlling the sale and prices of their products and their influence in shaping the policies and legislation of our State and National Governments. We must not be of those "who, having eyes, see not, and having ears, hear not."

What a contrast when we come to the farmer. He is practically unorganized, and is going it alone. He might be compared to a vessel, drifting without a rudder at the mercy of every passing current. I am gratified, however, to know that he is now making some headway in the direction of better organization. Until he is thus organized he will labor at a great disadvantage, and will be terribly handicapped in the race of production. In every move he now makes he encounters organization. He takes practically what is offered for what he has to sell, and pays what is asked of him when he buys. He has practically no voice in fixing the price of his services, and nothing to say in fixing the prices of the things he buys. This is an unsound basis, and something must be done to change it, to the end that he may have the same voice and influence in his business as other industries have in theirs. He must be placed on an equal footing with others. He must not be required to pay tribute to all other industries, and the latter must not receive exorbitant profits at his expense.

Mr. Jefferson, after summing up the functions of our Government in his first inaugural address, wisely said:

Still one thing more, fellow citizens—a wise and frugal government, which shall restrain men from injuring one another, which shall leave them otherwise free to regulate their own pursuits of industry and improvement, and shall not take from the mouth of labor the bread it has earned.

It seems to me that in these latter days we have overlooked this important duty of the Government. It must restrain one industry from injuring another. This is more important now than in the day it was uttered. Then production was more simple and there was not so much dependence on one another. Every step in the division of labor, in the growth of great industries has made each class more dependent on the others. One can readily see how dependent the farmer is on many of the other industries, and how helpless he is with his own strength to protect himself. Here is where the Government must step in. I am not discussing any special remedy, but a principle which should be applied in all legislation intended for the relief of the farmer. The selfish interests of the country are now advancing the doctrine that the Government can do nothing to protect the farmer from the encroachments of organized wealth. Those who advance it know better.

It is all right for their lobbyists to swarm about the legislative halls in the States and Nation to seek and often obtain favors at the expense of the farmers, but they want them to take a back seat and not even ask the Government to prevent others from injuring them. As I understand the farmer, he is not asking for subsidies or special favors, but is demanding that other industries shall not prey upon his income and reduce him to poverty.

There has been too much of a tendency to legislate for other selfish interests and classes at the expense of the farmer. The breaking point has been reached. That policy must be changed.

Why should the farmer's land and other property increase in value for 20 years, and then suddenly take a downward course and keep going down until he has suffered the most appalling loss in the history of our country? This question must not be evaded. It must be answered. According to the census returns in 1900, the farm property, including land in the United States, was valued at $20,000,000,000 in round numbers. In 1910 it had increased to forty billions. In 1920 it had increased to seventy-seven billions. In my opinion it was worth much more than these estimates. These figures, however, show that his land, buildings, and other farm property had steadily increased in value in times of peace as well as in times of war, until it reached its peak in 1920. The World War formally ended in November, 1918. There was no decline in the next succeeding two years. This value was not a bubble created by the war. It existed long before the war began. What has been the situation of the farmer for the past three years? Words can not describe it. His prosperity has disappeared; his land and other property have gone down, while nearly everything he bought kept up. The effect was that his dollar fell in purchasing power, and his local and State taxes, as well as his debts, have almost doubled. His freight rates have at times been equal to the price of his products, and he has been rapidly drifting into bankruptcy. I saw a recent statement that over 23 per cent of the farmers in 15 wheat and corn growing States are either bankrupt or saved from actual bankruptcy by the leniency of their creditors. Thousands of them have lost their farms and have either become tenants or have taken the last look at the old homestead and started with the little they had left for the towns and cities to begin life over again. What a flood of thoughts must have come into his mind as he and his family passed down the lane. You may argue with others that there is nothing wrong, but do not try to argue with him.

This is not all. In the last three years the farmer's land—his capital—has, in my opinion, decreased from one-third to one-half in value. It was stated on this floor in the recent debate on the tax bill that a person could take $10,000 to-day and go into any State in the Union and buy more land with it than could have been purchased three years ago for $25,000. That would mean a loss of three-fifths. I will not put it quite so strong as that, but assuming it has been only one-third, it would still mean a sum of more than half of our part of the cost of the World War. Can those charged with the duty of legislation turn away and pass by on the other side in the face of such facts as these? One of the strange things has been the attitude of writers, public men, and a large part of the daily press on this question. Many speeches have been made, many newspaper articles have appeared, and many special writers have presented their views. Many national and local conferences have been held and many resolutions have been adopted. One of the peculiar things about all of these speeches, resolutions, and articles has been the lack of harmony as to the condition of the farmer, the proper remedy for his relief, and in almost all of them the entire absence of any suggestion as to the cause of this condition. I have sometimes wondered whether some of these papers and speakers really wanted to find the cause of the decline, whether if they had found the cause it would have conflicted with some of the theories of certain public men. Interest sometimes warps the judgment and blinds the vision. In my opinion some of these writers and speakers did not want to admit the condition or find the cause. Some of them have talked all around the question and tried to make it appear that there was nothing wrong, that it would only be a short time until the farmer's condition would be all right. The billboards first told him he was prosperous. Then whole page advertisements in metropolitan newspapers gave him like information. Others vaguely hinted there might be something wrong, but urged that his better days were just around the corner and would soon be here. It was also urged that the tariff had been put on his products, and many favorable laws enacted that would soon restore him to industrial life. His implements were placed on the free list, but no reduction resulted therefrom. Farming has become so unprofitable that his boys and other help are leaving the farm and drifting into the towns and cities, there to struggle with the already overcrowded labor conditions.

There has been too much of a disposition of those discussing the question to look at it only in the light of giving relief to the farmer. That is the wrong viewpoint. The prosperity of all depends on him. If his prosperity is impaired, it will not be long until it reaches the whole industrial system. It has been charged that he has not used good judgment, that he is a poor business man, and that he is to blame for his present condition. Such opinions come from those who either do not understand the question or do not want to understand it. Some have urged that the distress is limited to the Wheat Belt and that the farmer has been raising too much wheat. Every farmer knows there is more to the question than merely the production and price of wheat. He knows that his land and property have fallen, while clothing, boots, shoes, coal, fencing, farm implements, fertilizer, building material, and about everything else he has to buy, as well as his freight rates, have not come down. The suggestion that the farmer must diversify his productions more is met with the fact that, as a general rule, such a thing is impossible. The farmers of Indiana and the Western States can not turn from wheat, oats, and corn to raising cotton, sugar cane, peanuts, and tropical fruits.

It is not my purpose at this time to try to locate or enumerate the causes for this condition. I know when we come to the question there will be a difference of opinion, such as there is on almost every public question, but I feel certain, however, that there can be no further difference of opinion as to the main point—that the farmer has lost billions of his capital and is drifting down the stream headed for the rocks.

Some gentlemen say that there is no remedy and that Congress can do nothing to change these conditions. If the Government can not restrain others from injuring him, then he is without remedy and is surrounded by forces and influences over which he has but little control. He must have the aid of the Government. I have more faith in the physician who tries to find out what is wrong with his patient and applies some remedy than the one who stands by and says, "Nothing can be done," and applies no remedy. It is not always possible to foresee all of the results of any given course of action. We must not give up. Our country has come nearer solving public questions and evils than any other in the world. We would be unworthy of the age in which we live if we should acknowledge our inability to cope with this great industrial problem. I like the American who has cut the word "fail" out of his dictionary. Though the way may seem dark and almost impassable, we must gather new strength and determination and push forward. Clouds will disappear and obstructions fade away. Remedies must go further than to afford only temporary relief. They must go to the root of the evil and remove the causes.

In speaking of the corporations, the aggregations of wealth, and other great industries of the country I do not mean that they must be impaired. They are a part of our great industrial system, and when acting in their proper sphere promote the general good. What I do mean is that they must not be allowed to control this Government nor to fix their charges so high as to impoverish the farmers and other classes. They must live and let others live.

I realize there have been a number of bills introduced on many phases of this question, that the Agricultural Committee of the House and Senate have been holding hearings and are going into this question and have been collecting much valuable information, which will be reported to each body in due time. At that time the whole question should be discussed. I feel very confident that much new light will be thrown on the causes and remedies. If it should appear that any legislation contributed to this condition, it should be pointed out. If it should further appear that the money power took any action or adopted any policy which contracted the currency and credits, and thus aided in starting this deflation of the farmer's property, such facts should be laid bare and the responsibility fixed. The causes of this condition must be located.

The majority of our people live upon the farm. They largely raise their own living and the food for others. They produce more than can be consumed in this country, and the surplus must be sold in the markets of the world. The movement of the farmers' crops must not be obstructed by exorbitant transportation rates. To the farmers of the Northwest, it seems to me, the improvement of the St. Lawrence River is very important. This would enable the great ocean-going vessels to anchor in every harbor of the Great Lakes. There they would be loaded with the farmers' surplus products and pass down that mighty stream to the markets of the world. This is not all. We are approaching the point in our development where we must soon take steps to provide for inland waterways, the improvement of our larger rivers for transportation, and water power for the generation of electricity for light, heat, and power.

Our whole system of production and distribution depends upon reasonable transportation rates. There can be no permanent solution of the present situation of the farmer without considering these questions.

There is another phase of this question which should not be overlooked. We appropriated over $69,000,000 for the Agricultural Department of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1924. This money was used to promote agriculture and increase the production of the soil. Besides this, the States also expended large sums for the same purposes. It seems to me that while we are expending such large sums to encourage the farmers to produce it would be a good thing to expend part of it in finding places throughout the world where they could sell their wheat, oats, corn, flour, meal, beef, pork, and other products. The farmer can not do this. The Government must. In my opinion, it is just as important as encouraging production. This question should be considered, and if further legislation is required, it should be enacted. There is something wrong with a system of distribution or marketing which permits the speculators, middlemen, and transportation companies to take a toll of over $15,000,000,000 on the farmer's products and leave him only $7,500,000,000 in the transaction. How much longer can he stand such a toll? He can not long produce if his profits are taken to pay such tribute to other industries.

I am inclined to believe that the present condition of the farmer will not be benefited by relaxing our immigration laws. We have so many young American boys and girls who must soon become the heads of homes and families and take our places in the task of perpetuating our Government and our institutions that I am in favor of giving them a chance first before looking elsewhere in other countries. It is important to the future of our country that the American boys and girls retain the ownership of our farms. Farm life must be made more profitable and attractive. Rather than lower the bars of foreign immigration at present, I would raise them higher, with careful selection before they embark, until we can better determine what would be best for our country. I would also prefer giving the American laboring man in the mill, factory, on the railroad, and all other lines of employment a trial before importing others from foreign lands. It should be noted that some of the big interests which have been profiteering off the farmers and other people are clamoring loudest for letting down the bars. Further consideration of the question might prove that a limited number of farm and domestic laborers would be a good thing.

Cooperative marketing is a necessity for the American farmer. The States should enact legislation for that purpose, and the farmers of the country must organize in order to carry it out. Organization is one of the first steps to be taken in any plan of permanent relief for them. Congress should carefully consider the question and encourage it in every way possible within its powers. Just to the extent that farming becomes unprofitable, too great a proportion of our population will drift from the farms to the towns and cities, and this will disturb the proper balancing of our industries.

The conditions are too grave for public servants to trifle with this question. I do not want to take up your time with idle words. I have no right to do so. But I do want to say with all of the force I can command that some reasonable reforms must be made to arrest the spread of these conditions. The duty of making this reformation does not rest on Congress alone, but on every class. The great industries, corporations, and organizations of wealth of the country are a mighty power for good or evil. They must restrain their desires for making money within the bounds of reasonable profits. They must not try to dictate the policies or control the actions of our Government. That must remain within the hands of the people. The pulpit and the press, which have so much to do with the moulding of public opinion, must not close their eyes to these conditions and remain silent and indifferent. There can be no neutrals in this contest.

Why is it important to change this condition? It is apparent to everyone that there is a great deal of propaganda in Europe against our form of government, and that it has been drifting to our shores. It is abroad in the land. What are these enemies of our Government saying? They are trying to turn our people against the Government by asserting that it is a failure, and permits wealth to grind down the producing classes. Every failure of the Government to restrain wealth and power from injuring the producing classes only adds fuel to the flames of radicalism. Every citizen must feel that part of the duty rests upon him to aid in setting the house in order. We are all one great family and one member can not be injured without injury to all.

I hold with Emerson, when he said—

> That America is another name for opportunity. Our whole history appears like a last act of Divine Providence in behalf of the human race.

I earnestly believe that here in this land it was intended under our form of government that the divine right of men and women to govern themselves should be established and worked out. We must not fail.

Thus far, I have been considering this question solely as an economic question. It is much more than that. The more contented and prosperous the people are, the stronger our Government will be. The influence of the country home and country school has much to do with the development and moulding of the character and inspiring the ideals of the true American citizen. Its influence permeates every phase of our national life. Here in the quiet home, surrounded with the beauties of nature, the farmer and his good wife and family toil together from early morn until late at night. In tilling the soil they are dealing with the wonderful forces in the workshop of nature. Their surroundings and life incline them to sound thinking, and tend to give them the correct view of the great problems of life and government. Out of his home come the millions of young men and women who must soon take up the great conflict of life. The farms of America must never fall into the hands of speculators and landlords. The farmer must continue to own his own home. Around his fireside and under his candlelight, the future destiny of this Republic will be determined. [Applause.]

[Mr. COOK was given permission to revise and extend his remarks in the RECORD.]

Mr. MADDEN. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. AYRES].

[Mr. AYRES was given permission to revise and extend his remarks in the RECORD.]

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Chairman, in view of the fact that prohibition was made an issue in the last campaign for Congress in my district, notwithstanding the fact I had voted for the submission of the eighteenth constitutional amendment and also voted for what is known as the Volstead Act and all other prohibition acts—good, bad, or indifferent—it made no difference, I met the acid test; yet the voters of my district were told that owing to the fact that my opponent was a member of the great Judiciary Committee of this House, his defeat would be considered a backward step for prohibition and would encourage the antiprohibitionists.

I took the position then and take it now that many bills introduced in Congress for light wines and beer and for the modification of the so-called Volstead Act, their authors knew good and well none of them would receive any consideration whatever. In the first place, I doubt whether the Judiciary Committee would give them any consideration, and even if it did, the authors of the measures knew the committee would not think of reporting them out; and further, if the committee could be persuaded to give any of these bill consideration, and to the extent of reporting them out for consideration of the whole Congress, they would be overwhelmingly beaten.

I am inclined to the belief the Members introducing such bills and making speeches about them do it solely for home consumption, to let a wet district or a wet constituency know their Representative is still sound in the faith. It has, however, another effect; that is, it causes the prohibitionists and law enforcement people everywhere to feel uneasy, and causes them to write their Congressman to be on the watch and see that nothing of the kind is put over.

Mr. Chairman, the introducing of these bills and the apparent effort made by wet Congressmen or Congressmen representing a wet constituency does not in the least jeopardize the prohibition cause, for prohibition is here to stay and no Congress within our time will repeal or modify the prohibitory laws.

I said in the campaign just referred to, and I say now, the real cause for alarm or anxiety, however, is the nonenforcement of the laws we now have. This may be due, first, to inefficient officers or corrupt officials whose duty it is to enforce the law, or, second, it may be due to the lack of sufficient funds to enable honest and efficient officers to do their duty. As to the first proposition, that is a question of administration over which Congress has no control. As to the second proposition, that is a Congressional matter.

It is a well-known fact that it is impossible to stamp out illicit traffic in intoxicating liquors unless we can stop the smuggling of it into this country from foreign countries. It is also a well-known fact that smuggling liquor into this country has become a well-established business and every device and method has been adopted to successfully carry on that business. We all know to destroy this business of smuggling successfully rests almost entirely with the activities of the Coast Guard Service. We further know that this service has been woefully handicapped because of the lack of sufficient force and speedier craft. With this inadequate equipment the Coast Guard has been in a manner helpless to prevent this traffic, and as Admiral Billard said, when before our committee urging this appropriation, the rum runners, realizing this helplessness of the Coast Guard, encouraged others to go into the business until it has grown by leaps and bounds, so to speak.

There is but one way to break it up or destroy it, and that is to make this appropriation for the full amount asked.

I thought I had some ideas how the rum runner performed, but after hearing the evidence of Admiral Billard and Commander Root I realized I knew nothing concerning it. They showed it was not only a well-organized business but well financed and advised. This organization has legal and technical advisers of the highest skill. They employ seagoing people, many of them the most daring and desperate characters. These men are armed with the best up-to-date firearms and will fight to kill.

They have a sea force at this time of 34 steamers and 132 sailing vessels, ranging in size from 35 tons to 3,000 tons. It is said some of these vessels are capable of making a speed of 19 knots, and most of them fly American flags. And right here I want to say I intend to see if it can be done; that is to say, if a law can be passed to make it piracy for an American citizen who uses the American flag for the purpose of shielding his business conducted in violation of law, such as is done in this instance. I intend to introduce such a measure and ask for its passage.

It was shown that this organization has an auxiliary craft for making shore contact; that is, bringing their wares and merchandise from these vessels anchored out of the limit to the shores. This auxiliary fleet consists of gasoline-driven craft, most of which can make a speed of about 25 knots. Sometimes they use aircraft.

They have a well-defined code whereby they can transmit intelligence between their forces out at sea to their forces on shore.

If this business was carried on in but one place, then, of course, it would be an easy matter to handle it, but such is not the case. It is not confined to New York City, but is carried on in places like Long Island Sound, Delaware and Chesapeake Bays, along the coast of Florida, and the coast of Maine; they do a thriving business along the coast of Charleston, S. C., at Galveston, and Jacksonville. There are large activities in smuggling narcotics and liquors in the Puget Sound country, as well as at San Francisco, Calif., clear up to Ketchikan, Alaska. As a matter of fact there is nowhere, apparently, on any coast or border, but what this well-organized business of smuggling liquor into this country is carried on.

There could be much more said, Mr. Chairman, but it is enough to convince any one who believes in upholding the dignity of the United States and its laws, we should at once make available the appropriation of $13,858,981, and thus enable them to build more and speedier boats with sufficient men and officers to operate them. When we have done this, which is our responsibility, it is then up to the enforcement forces, which is their responsibility. If we furnish them the equipment, or means for equipment, and they do not do their duty, it is not the fault of Congress. Unless we do, however, it is our fault.

I hope there will not be a single vote cast against this particular item of the bill.

I want to call attention to just two or three items in the evidence of Commander Root and Admiral Billard given before the committee having in charge this deficiency appropriation bill. This is what Commander Root said:

With our present force, during the past 22 months we have been able to put out of business, by capture or otherwise, 153 vessels. Because of what I regard to be very serious defects in the laws and in the methods of procedure, a large percentage of these vessels have again fallen into the hands of their original owners and are now in active trade.

We have also captured the equivalent of 31,000 cases of liquor and caused to be jettisoned under fire an amount estimated at 20,000 cases, or a grand total of 51,000 cases. We have also to our credit a small quantity of narcotics.

* * * * * * *

Large as the amount captured may seem, it is but a drop in a bucket when compared with the actual quantities leaving foreign ports.

SHIPMENTS OF LIQUOR FROM EUROPEAN PORTS.

From reliable, but very incomplete, secret sources abroad I have information of the following shipments from northern European—mostly British—ports since January, 1922. The quantities are in round numbers: One hundred and thirty-six thousand six hundred equivalent cases of three gallons each, taken from manifests.

I say "equivalent cases" because where the quantities have been reported in gallons we have reduced it to the quantity usually contained in a case, so that the units will all be the same—1,110,000 equivalent cases, shipped in 37 ships. Total for 26 months, 1,246,600 cases, or practically 48,000 cases per month from northern Europe alone.

Of the above, during the last three months of last year—October, November, and December—63,000 cases were shipped from Scotland and 133,000 cases from Antwerp, or 196,000 cases in three months, which is about 63,000 cases a month.

In considering these last figures it should be remembered that they include only the known shipments, ascertained by our few scattered agents, and include but two countries. Mature consideration leads me to believe that the direct shipments from Europe alone to the United States amount to not less than 80,000 cases per month.

Since last May, or during the past nine months, 724,000 cases have arrived off New York entrance in the steamers Bernard M., Bru, Butetown, Gerbervillier, Istar, Johnstown, L'Auroch, Lutzen, Lyuntown, Obernal, Papyrus, Strand Hill, Ulw, Wyke Regis, and in the German schooner Emmie Friedrich and the Dutch schooner Zeehond. This amounts to 80,000 cases per month, and does not include the thousands of cases brought to our shores by British and French sailing vessels from the enemy advance bases.

So you can see, gentlemen, the difficulty that the Coast Guard has in running down these rum runners.

I want to read another portion of the evidence, where Commander Root says:

When captured, the enemy begins his defense by refusing to testify at the hearing held before the collector of customs. If he does not thus escape and is haled before a magistrate, he usually gets his own release and that of his vessel at this preliminary hearing in the face of the fact that it is unlawful to release on bond a vessel which has been seized for forfeiture. (See 166 U. S. 1, 68.)

When released on bond he invariably and at once enters the business again, charging to ordinary "overhead" the bond which he will forfeit.

If by chance he is held for trial, instead of being indicted for conspiracy, which is a felony, he is tried on an information for a misdemeanor, thus escaping the full penalty of the law and estopping appeal by the Government.

In view of what was said here yesterday, I think there is a way whereby the Coast Guard could effectively bring about suppression of this illicit traffic and not come to us every year for additional appropriations, for additional personnel, and for additional boats. There was a law passed in 1819. It is now a part of our statutes. It has met the test of the Supreme Court time and again. It was a law referring to slave traffic.

I intend to introduce a bill based upon those statutes. In fact, it is practically the same statute. I have substituted the words "intoxicating liquors" for the word "slaves." It reads as follows:

SECTION 1. Whoever, being of the crew or ship's company of any foreign vessel engaged in the trade of intoxicating liquors, or being of the crew or ship's company of any vessel owned wholly or in part, or navigated for or on behalf of any citizen of the United States, or flies the flag of the United States of America, has on board of such vessel any intoxicating liquors, or on board such vessel offers or attempts to sell such intoxicating liquors, or on the high seas, or anywhere on tidewater, transfers or delivers to any other vessel any such intoxicating liquors, or lands or delivers on shore from on board such vessel any intoxicating liquors, with intent to make sale of, or having previously sold such intoxicating liquors, is a pirate and shall be imprisoned for five years.

That section of the law has been upheld by the Supreme Court of the United States time and again. Let me now read section 2:

SEC. 2. Whoever builds, fits out, equips, loads, or otherwise prepares or sends away, either as master, factor, or owner, any vessel in any port or place within the jurisdiction of the United States, or causes such vessel to sail from any port or place whatsoever within such jurisdiction for the purpose of procuring intoxicating liquors from any foreign kingdom, or country, or from seas, to be transported to any port or place whatsoever to be held, sold, or otherwise disposed of, is a pirate and shall be imprisoned for five years.

I now read section 3:

SEC. 3. Whoever, within the jurisdiction of the United States, takes on board, receives, or transports from any foreign kingdom, country, or from sea any intoxicating liquors in any vessel, for the purpose of holding, selling, or otherwise disposing of such intoxicating liquors, is a pirate and shall be imprisoned for five years.

Section 4 is taken from the Kansas statute and is as follows:

SEC. 4. Any person who, having once been duly convicted of a violation of this act, and shall thereafter, directly or indirectly, violate any of the provisions of this act, shall be considered a persistent violator, and shall be deemed guilty of a felony, and upon conviction thereof shall be imprisoned in the penitentiary at hard labor for not more than 10 years.

If you will pass a law of that kind which makes a man who deals in the illicit traffic of intoxicating liquors a pirate and places him in the penitentiary for so doing, then we will not be called upon every year for a deficiency appropriation to help the Coast Guard enforce this law. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kansas has expired.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I now yield to the gentlemen from Oklahoma [Mr. HASTINGS].

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Chairman, the bill under consideration, being a deficiency bill, carries appropriations to cover many deficiencies, and included among them are appropriations heretofore authorized to complete certain hospitals for use of the ex-service men.

I want to take this occasion to emphasize the necessity of providing adequate hospital facilities for all ex-service men and to urge action liberalizing legislation with reference to their hospitalization, and I believe that all of them who are suffering from tuberculosis, or any lingering disease, without requiring proof of the origin of the disease, whether it originated in the service or not, should be given hospital treatment at the expense of the Government.

Many of the soldiers, when the World War was over, were very anxious to return home, and I fear that the examinations made when they were discharged were made more or less in haste, and diseases in their incipient stages at the time, later developed seriously, which, perhaps, a more thorough examination at the time would have disclosed.

I also favor a liberalization of our laws with reference to claims for compensation. I think every presumption should be indulged in favor of the soldier and that action upon their claims should be expedited in every way possible consistent with safety to the Government.

Upon the question of claims and upon the question of admission to hospitals, I have always thought that there should be more contact officers placed in the field who would visit various points throughout the country and confer with the ex-soldiers, who could be advised as to the time of their visits through the Legion posts everywhere. These contact officers could be of great service to the ex-service men in taking either original or supplemental testimony with reference to their claims, either for compensation or for hospital treatment, and give them helpful and sympathetic advice.

I also favor an adjusted compensation bill now being considered by the Ways and Means Committee of the House, but I trust the bill will provide, when reported, for a cash payment.

I do not object to the option of paid-up insurance, and the other options, provided they are voluntary, but I favor adjusted compensation payable in cash, paid from proceeds of long-term bonds to be issued, maturing at a time when they can be paid from the amounts to be repaid to us by foreign governments upon their indebtedness to us, and will vote for that if given an opportunity. I do not favor a sales tax to raise the necessary revenue.

I have enlarged these views in a letter to the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee of the House of Representatives under date of March 10, 1923, which is as follows:

UNITED STATES HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., March 10, 1923.

Hon. W. R. GREEN,
Chairman Ways and Means Committee,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. GREEN: With reference to the adjusted compensation bills pending before the Ways and Means Committee, permit me to say that I favor adjusted compensation for ex-service men, payable in cash. I do not object to the other options—paid-up insurance, vocational training, or the home-ownership provision; provided, of course, that these options are entirely voluntary. I think, however, that we should adjust the compensation for the ex-service men in cash.

During the World War I was privileged to represent the second congressional district of Oklahoma in Congress and during that time voted for all legislation and appropriations recommended for the successful carrying on of the World War, including additional compensation for soldiers, care for dependents at home, compensation for disabilities received, appropriations for munitions, food, and clothing, for vocational training, for hospital service, and, in fact, all appropriations recommended as necessary.

The overseas service men received $33 per month, or $1.10 per day; those who served in the Army but did not go overseas received $30 per month, or $1 per day, and part of this compensation was deducted for dependents at home; while those who were not called to the colors were receiving from $4 to $10 per day, and more.

If we adjust the compensation of those who saw service overseas by giving them $1.25 per day additional, they will have received $2.35 per day for leaving home, enduring all sorts of hardships, exposing themselves to the ravages of disease, and the dangers of war.

We made appropriations to compensate the railroads for the use of their properties, we paid contractors for damages incurred by reason of canceling contracts and paid large sums to the owners of mines for taking over their property.

We adjusted the claims of all of these and of other persons, and I think it fair, equitable, and right, that we adjust the loss of the ex-service men who went to the front, won the war, and kept the hands of civilization from being turned back for a thousand years.

Nor do I think that they could be subjected to the criticism that adjusting their compensation is commercializing their patriotism. We have recognized the services of our soldiers in all former wars, by land grants, pensions, hospital services, and the prior right to take homesteads upon the public domain.

We gave Gen. Phil Sheridan 160 acres of land as additional compensation for services in the Indian wars of 1853; we gave Gen. William T. Sherman 160 acres of land for services in the Seminole Indian and Mexican wars; we gave Gen. Winfield Scott a like recognition for his services in the Mexican War; Gen. Robert E. Lee received a grant of 160 acres of land under the act of 1850 in recognition of his services in the Mexican War; we gave a like bounty to Gen. U. S. Grant of 160 acres of land, and gave Abraham Lincoln 40 acres of land for his brief services in the Black Hawk Indian war.

I think no one can suggest that this recognition of a generous Republic commercialized their patriotism.

In this connection permit me to say that I favor the issuance of bonds to cover the cost of adjusted compensation, similar to the bonds issued during the World War, and with a sinking fund provided for, so that they can be paid out of the indebtedness due and owing us from foreign governments, which, according to the report of the Secretary of the Treasury of December 3, 1923, amounted to the sum of $9,636,828,204.50, and with the past due interest added will increase the amount to more than $10,000,000,000.

Adjusted compensation for the ex-service man is an obligation growing out of the war and should be provided for and financed as such.

In addition to this recognition of the services of our soldiers during the World War, I favor adequate hospital facilities for all ex-service men suffering with tuberculosis or any lingering disease, regardless of whether they can prove that it originated in the service or not, and I favor a liberalization and a sympathetic interpretation of the legislation heretofore enacted for the payment of claims for compensation and expeditious action upon the same.

Sincerely yours,
W. W. HASTINGS,
Second District of Oklahoma.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes of my time to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS].

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CONNERY].

[By unanimous consent, Mr. CONNERY was granted leave to extend his remarks in the RECORD.]

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, I take this opportunity to register my protest against the gag rule which is being foisted upon us by the Republican Party in respect to the soldiers' bonus bill and the way in which it is to be considered. I came down here from my district with the hope in my mind at least that when the bonus legislation came up both Democrats and Republicans would look upon the matter in a true, nonpartisan way, and that they would realize that the men who went over to France to fight for their country would be considered first and that partisanship should come second. I am a Democrat, and I laid my cards on the table before the Committee on Ways and Means the other day when I said I hoped that this would be considered in a nonpartisan way. They have not done so. I take this opportunity to protest in the name of my buddies and in the name of the ex-service men in my district and throughout the United States against this joke which is being sent out and called a bonus bill, to deceive the soldiers of the United States of America. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Chairman, the vote of the Ways and Means Committee on the twofold plan was 13 to 12. Eleven of the Democrats and one Republican voted in favor of the twofold plan. We had asked that the matter be considered in a nonpartisan way. Five of us had been appointed by a Democratic conference, not a caucus, to go before the members of the Ways and Means Committee of both parties and tell them that in our minds, as five service men, we thought that the best interests of the soldiers of the United States would be served by giving them the choice of a twofold plan.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNERY. I yield for a question.

Mr. MADDEN. Is this a nonpartisan committee that the gentleman served upon?

Mr. CONNERY. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. Made up of Democrats?

Mr. CONNERY. Yes; they were Democrats but they were nonpartisan. They were instructed to get in touch with both sides of the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. MADDEN. The committee was appointed by a Democratic caucus, was it not?

Mr. CONNERY. No.

Mr. MADDEN. Then by a Democratic conference?

Mr. CONNERY. Yes. We would not be bound. The Democratic service men asked that a conference be called.

Mr. MADDEN. I am very glad to hear the gentleman making his nonpartisan protest against a bipartisan situation.

Mr. CONNERY. I am complaining about the partisanship of the Republican Party, and I want to assure you it is going to be very easy for me to sit up here and vote yea on the bill that is to come up. If I do vote yea, I shall go back to the service men and tell them that I voted yea because it was the only thing the gag rule allowed us to vote on, and I am going to put the responsibility where it belongs, and that is with the Republican Party, and I can assure you that up in Massachusetts the service men, many of them Republicans, who helped to send me down here as a service man, are going to do a lot of thinking about that, and I think you are going to see the results of that gag rule in the next election. I take this opportunity to protest, not as a Democrat but as an ex-service man in Congress, and, saying it without egotism, I served for 19 months in France, and I claim to know what my buddies in this country want. I think you are insulting them when the Ways and Means Committee comes before the ex-service men and says to them, "We do not think you are intelligent enough to know whether you can take your choice between a cash plan and a paid-up insurance plan." That is an insult to the intelligence of every service man in the United States. I protest, and if I have to vote in favor of this bill on next Tuesday, as the next best thing I shall vote for it, but I shall vote for it, I repeat, under protest, and I shall send out a statement to the newspapers in my district and to ex-service men in my district to let them know what the Republican Party is handing them in the form of this joke, which is called a bonus bill. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BRAND]. [Applause.]

Mr. BRAND of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, in a speech delivered by me on the floor of the House on March 7, 1922, I raised the question as to the qualification of Hon. Andrew J. Mellon, Secretary of the Treasury, to act as a member of Refunding Commission, which was created for the purpose of liquidating obligations due the United States by European countries.

I took the position if Mr. Mellon was interested as a stockholder in any of the business concerns therein referred to, or related by affinity or consanguinity within the prohibitive degree, he was disqualified to act as a member of this commission.

In this speech I made a statement of many of his business connections.

In the light of his well-known opposition to an adjusted compensation law for the ex-service men of the World War, I want to call attention to this statement, which included banking institutions, corporations, and other business enterprises in which he was engaged and interested at the time his commission was created:

The Mellon National Bank, the Pittsburgh Coal Co., the Union Trust Co.

The Aluminum Co. of America; capitalization, $20,000,000; controlling five companies with a combined capital of $20,000,000.

The American Locomotive Co.; capital, $50,000,000.

The American Metal Co., a holding company, $25,000,000 capital, which controls 12 companies with combined capitalization of $8,000,000.

The Baltimore Car & Foundry Co., $1,500,000.

The Carborundum Co., $2,500,000.

The Gulf Oil Corporation, $60,000,000, which controls nine companies with a combined capitalization of $24,000,000.

This makes a total capitalization of $210,000,000.

Banks and trust companies, $33,500,000. Total capitalization, $243,500,000.

National Bank of Commerce of New York; capitalization, $25,000,000; surplus, $25,000,000; deposits, $363,000,000. Mellon National Bank; capitalization, $6,000,000; surplus, $5,000,000; deposits, $102,000,000. Union Savings Bank; capitalization, $1,000,000; surplus, $1,000,000; deposits, $20,000,000. Union Trust Co.; capitalization, $1,500,000; surplus, $35,000,000; deposits, $100,000,000.

Pennsylvania Railroad Co., of which prior to January, 1921, he was a director, with a total capital of $440,000,000. Grand total capitalization, $683,500,000.

The record of the personal activities of Secretary Mellon includes 4 banks, of one of which he recently resigned the presidency to enter the Cabinet, 4 insurance companies, 7 educational and philanthropic institutions, and 62 other corporations. Their products—oil, aluminum, railway cars, locomotives, steel, plate glass, radiators, carborundum, bolts and rivets, motor trucks, and a hundred other things—go all over the world. The Mellon National Bank, of Pittsburgh, has resources of $132,000,000 and deposits aggregating $105,000,000. The concerns in which he was actively interested prior to March 4 have resources in excess of $800,000,000.

This list of Mr. Mellon's holdings is by no means exclusive, for it is now generally believed that he is the second richest man in the world.

Though I am mindful of the fact that self-interest during all the centuries past has influenced the hearts and minds of men in all the affairs of life, I desire to make no comment upon this statement.

Res ipsa loquitur. [Applause.]

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from New York [Mr. KINDRED].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized for four minutes.

Mr. KINDRED. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, the moral obligation of the Government of the United States to pay adjusted compensation or an honorarium to our ex-service men is manifestly binding as a sacred obligation. I rejoice that our great Government recognized it as a binding and sacred obligation when it paid, as is shown by the official Government records, to the immortal George Washington a bonus, when it paid to the immortal Abraham Lincoln a bonus, and the illustrious Ulysses S. Grant a bonus, and to the illustrious Robert E. Lee a bonus for their services in the United States Army. [Applause.]

All of the first-class, and even of the second-class, nations of the world have recognized this obligation to the ex-service men by having long ago paid them a substantial bonus in an honorable, prompt way. The claims of our ex-service men and women, therefore, are absolutely just and proper. We should have long ago discharged this obligation in a proper and just way. I submit that we are not going to discharge this obligation on our part in an honest and just way when we are called upon next Tuesday, under a suspension of the rules, in a limited time for debate of 40 minutes, and without any opportunity whatever to change or amend the bill reported by the committee, to push through a bill which the ex-service men not only do not want but which is not fair to them. [Applause.] I submit that when we act thus, after all the disgraceful delay in settling their just claims, we should give to the ex-service men the option of a cash bonus as well as insurance. I am sure the House should use a more mature deliberation and judgment than that which is proposed in jamming through here next Tuesday this unjust measure.

When I am compelled to vote at that time for suspension of the rules, in order to have the opportunity to vote for any kind of a bonus measure, I shall do so with the distinct understanding that I favor a more just bonus bill, which would give, in addition to insurance, an option to every ex-service man to be paid in cash, if he desired to exercise such an option.

I have originally and consistently favored this double-option plan. [Applause.]

But I also gladly voted for the four-option plan (the Fordney-McCumber bill) in the last (Sixty-seventh) Congress.

The insurance feature is good as far as it goes, and appeals to many ex-service men.

In connection with this insurance plan carried in the committee's bill which will be reported to the House for a vote under the gag rule already referred to, the average insurance policy provided for each ex-service man, amounts to $—.

PRACTICALLY STEALING FROM THE EX-SERVICE MAN.

The United States Government agreed to pay the soldier the paltry sum of $30 to suffer hardships and death. We practically compelled him to insure his life—a life dedicated to his country—and deducted out of this $30 monthly salary the cost of his insurance, and thus reduced the pay of the soldier at the front and in the camps to that extent—and this loss has been estimated at $20 per month for each soldier. Their pay was, to this extent, unjustly diminished, this unjust deduction amounting on an average to $270 for each of the more than 4,000,000 men. We are therefore in this committee bill, not giving vindication and a just compensation to the ex-service men, but simply returning to them practically the same amount the Government unjustly took away from them in insurance premiums and costs.

I wish to emphasize that a great and grateful country like ours, with practically unlimited financial and other resources and with fine traditions in the matter of fair treatment of its soldiers and sailors, can and should, even though so long delayed, pass a measure that is decent and just to the ex-service men and women who so valiantly defended our country's honor and interests in its hour of peril, under unusual conditions of hardship, suffering, and sacrifice. To deny them the option of receiving a cash payment is an injustice for which there is no excuse, particularly as it is a fact that the most reliable, unbiased financial experts have shown that a cash payment and a full discharge of the United States Government's obligation at once to every ex-service man and woman entitled to adjusted compensation would prove most satisfactory to the ex-service men and much cheaper to the taxpayers of the country, because it would not involve the costly administrative bureaucratic features involved in the plan contained in the present bill.

HOSPITALIZATION OF ALL SICK AND DISABLED VETERANS.

The management or mismanagement in the matter of hospitalization and medical care of the sick and disabled veterans of the World War constitutes a sad and disgraceful blot on the fair name of our great country.

While I, as a physician and Representative in Congress, with facilities for ascertaining the real facts, believe that the present management of the United States Veterans' Bureau and of the agencies for the hospitalization and medical treatment of the sick and disabled veterans have been greatly improved as compared with the outrageous conditions that have been proven to exist in the past, as is shown by the investigation and indictment of the former Director of the Veterans' Bureau, C. R. Forbes, I am of the opinion that there is still room for improvement in the detailed administration and management of this most important branch of the Government service, than which there is none more sacred.

With the special knowledge and equipment of a physician of many years' experience, I unearthed many startling facts in the mismanagement and disgraceful conduct of the Veterans' Bureau under Forbes, as will be shown by the following remarks which I presented in a speech in the House of Representatives during the last (Sixty-seventh) Congress March 17,

1922, which was entitled "A crisis in the hospitalization of the sick and disabled veterans of the World War—a national disgrace under ex-Director Forbes."

The developments and overwhelming proof of the crookedness and wrongdoing, at the expense of the sick and disabled ex-service men, of the former head of the United States Veterans' Bureau, have fully borne out the facts contained in the speech which I then delivered and from which I quote in part as follows (I will first refer to that part of this speech which dealt with the stupidity and criminal negligence of that branch of the Veterans' Bureau which was charged with the responsibility of establishing new hospitals for the sick and disabled ex-service men, particularly those for tubercular and neuropsychiatric—insane or nervous—patients. I also will include that part of this speech in which I proved not only culpable neglect and incompetence in the matter of promptly establishing new hospitals, but also incontrovertible proof of the inadequate and unkind treatment of these unfortunate and disabled ex-service men):

A CRISIS IN THE HOSPITALIZATION OF THE SICK AND DISABLED VETERANS OF THE WORLD WAR—A NATIONAL DISGRACE.

(Speech of Hon. JOHN J. KINDRED, of New York, in the House of Representatives, March 17, 1922.)

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 25 minutes to the gentleman from New York, Doctor KINDRED.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York is recognized for 25 minutes.

Mr. KINDRED. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, in view of the crisis in the hospital needs of the sick ex-service men of this country, and in view of the many letters which I, among other Members of the House, have received, calling attention to this sad and disgraceful condition, and in view of the further fact that the so-called Langley bill was introduced into this House on Monday last, I believe, carrying appropriations for $17,000,000 for additional hospital facilities for the ex-service men who are disabled and sick, I, as a physician of over 30 years' practical experience in hospital management, desire to call the attention of the gentlemen of the committee to certain very sad and disgraceful facts connected with the crisis in our hospital needs for the disabled war veterans to which I have referred.

As a specialist with a practical experience in mental and nervous diseases, which has extended over 30 years in the study of these diseases in the hospitals of New York, Pennsylvania, and Europe, I have naturally the keenest interest, along with all the other Members of Congress, in the hospitalization and medical care of disabled ex-service men, and from this point of view and without bias or partisanship I intend to present to the Members of the House of Representatives some facts which they and the people of this country should know with relation to what has really been done and what has not been done for these disabled men, whose welfare we all wish to serve.

It is timely to present this whole subject now, in view of the fact that Congress will be called upon in a few days to vote upon the bill introduced by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. LANGLEY], chairman of the Committee on Buildings and Grounds, and which will carry an appropriation of $17,000,000 for new hospitals in addition to the $28,600,000 already appropriated for hospitals and hospital equipment for these disabled men.

Commencing with the need for hospitalization and medical treatment of the first group of ex-service men who were sent back home disabled, we find that the United States Government had very inadequate hospitals, both as to the number of beds and hospital construction and equipment, and that the demand for more hospitals grew very rapidly, and that this demand has not been met at the present time. In other words, the United States was totally unprepared at that time and is still unprepared to properly hospitalize and humanely care for the disabled ex-service men and women.

Congress discussed at some length the first appropriation to increase and provide additional hospital facilities, and early declared its policy, to which it still adheres, to provide at all times any amount of money really necessary for the proper hospitalization and humane treatment of ex-service men, and the Sixty-fifth Congress appropriated $10,00,000 and the Sixty-sixth Congress appropriated $18,600,000, totaling $28,000,000, for hospitals and hospital equipment, exclusive of the $17,000,000 to be appropriated by the Langley bill.

Congress has also passed a number of bills in the interest of the disabled veterans of the World War, including the Sweet bill, which consolidated all activities of the Government relating to ex-service men into the United States Veterans' Bureau, of which Col. C. R. Forbes is the director. This bureau has the large and grave responsibility of adjusting what will ultimately reach many millions of claims for insurance, allotments, and compensation, besides the work of providing vocational training and arranging for the immediate care of over 30,000 sick men and women who require to be hospitalized and provided with medical and surgical treatment and proper nursing and care.

Reference is here made to an official chart issued by the Director of the Veterans' Bureau in connection with claims for compensation for disability and allotments, and so forth, indicating the expenditure by this bureau of nearly $2,000,000,000. It is certain that many additional billions will be necessary for these purposes and for additional hospital facilities during the next 30 years. The problem of providing sufficient and proper hospital beds and medical treatment for these men and women is the one I mainly wish to discuss at present.

These more than 30,000 sick and disabled are classified into three main classes: The medical and surgical cases, the tubercular, and the neuropsychiatric cases.

There are approximately 9,800 medical and surgical cases, 11,698 tubercular cases, and 9,000 neuropsychiatric cases in hospitals and 3,000 outside of hospitals. The last-named group—the neuropsychiatric—include both the simplest and the most complex nervous cases, and also the so-called psychasthenic cases, meaning those with mild or serious nervous and mental symptoms, and also include the various forms of outright insanity.

The proper housing and treatment of this last-named group, and also the tubercular group, is the disgraceful weakness of the Government's hospital system, to which I will refer later. This situation is a serious and sad one, and I approach the whole subject of its solution in no other spirit than that of trying to be helpful and constructive in the interest of our sick ex-service men, as well as in the interest of humanity and the people of this country.

The Surgeon General of the United States Public Health Service and also the Surgeon General of the United States Army and the Surgeon General of the United States Navy, all preeminently able and experienced heads of their respective departments, have carefully studied the problem of hospitalization for the ex-service men, and particularly has the United States Public Health Service, which has had the full responsibility of the medical care and treatment of nearly all the war veterans since the close of the World War, made exhaustive studies of this whole subject, which studies, together with voluminous reports and data for additional hospitals, have been made public in the form of the reports of the Surgeon General of the Public Health Service made annually to the Secretary of the United States Treasury.

The United States Public Health Service has from the beginning, with inadequate hospital and other facilities and under great difficulties, coped with the serious problem of supplying proper and humane medical and surgical treatment and care and nursing for the rapidly increasing number of sick and disabled war veterans; and it must in all fairness be stated that the Public Health Service deserves and should receive full credit and commendation for its achievements under difficult conditions, this service having, in fact, laid the broad and deep foundations for the good work in the medical treatment of the ex-service men which it is hoped and believed will be creditably continued.

The Public Health Service, under the direction of the Director of the United States Veterans' Bureau, is still responsible for the medical care and treatment of the war veterans who are in hospitals owned and controlled by the United States Government.

The total number of men being hospitalized by the bureau February 23, 1922, according to a letter addressed to me by the Director of the United States Veterans' Bureau, was 30,879.

Approximately one-third of this total number, namely, 4,200 patients, suffering with nervous and mental diseases, the neuropsychiatric group, and over 6,000 tubercular and medical and surgical cases, are not in Government owned and controlled hospitals, but are "farmed out" in State and privately controlled hospitals and institutions at the rate of $3 per day paid by the Government for each patient.

I pause here a moment to repeat that approximately one-third of the total number have no facilities for humane and proper treatment. There are no hospitals owned and controlled by the United States Government for 6,000 and more tubercular and medical and surgical cases which can not be provided for in Government hospitals, making a total of 10,000 that have to be farmed out, about one-third of the total number of 30,000 patients, who are the wards of the Government at the present time.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KINDRED. Yes.

Mr. LONDON. In the case of the 4,200 neuropsychiatric patients, would it not be better for individuals to take care of these men rather than place them in hospitals?

Mr. KINDRED. I am aware of the fact that that used to be considered a desirable method of treatment in certain kinds of cases. That is a long question which involves the question of neuropsychiatrics and a definition of each particular case. But with respect to some of the ideas involved in that connection the treatment of this whole class and various forms of curable psychiatric cases should be provided for as speedily as possible in Government-owned and Government-controlled hospitals.

In this connection I desire to say also that if a nervous case, which may be developing in the direction of outright insanity, or if a tubercular case whose tendency is to advance rapidly into an incurable stage—if these two classes of cases are not treated under proper conditions, if proper and nutritious food and proper surroundings and proper nursing and every hospital facility are not provided in the early stages of these two classes of disease, constituting, as we have seen, nearly one-third of the total number of cases under treatment by the Government, then there is no hope of cure at all in this class of cases.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. KINDRED. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Does the gentleman know of any tubercular cases in his district that are not receiving proper care?

Mr. KINDRED. I will call the gentleman's attention to the fact—which is a matter of record and not denied—that there are over 6,000 tubercular and medical and surgical cases that are not in Government-owned and Government-controlled hospitals, but are farmed out, and I call the attention of the gentleman in that connection to a report which I have as to the manner in which certain cases are treated in the State of Ohio.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. There are no such soldiers in my district who are not getting proper treatment.

Mr. KINDRED. The gentleman is indeed very fortunate if he has no tubercular ex-service men in his district. The gentleman himself must be exceedingly fortunate, and his district must be exceedingly well located from a climatological standpoint.

Further reference will be made to the neglect by governmental agencies which have deprived approximately 4,200 neuropsychiatric patients—meaning those who are suffering from the mildest nervous diseases and those with the most violent forms of insanity—and over 6,000 tubercular and medical and surgical cases of proper and humane treatment in Government owned and controlled hospitals.

Notwithstanding the fact that the United States Public Health Service and other governmental agencies had worked efficiently in an effort to solve the problem of rapidly providing additional Government owned and controlled hospitals, and notwithstanding the fact that ample data had been provided over a year ago, as a basis for expediting the work of selecting additional hospital sites and completing additional hospital facilities, we find that after the lapse of more than one year since the $18,600,000 appropriation made by the Sixty-sixth Congress became available, and since the so-called medical consultants on hospitalization of the United States Treasury Department assumed the responsibility of locating and constructing the 6,000 additional hospital beds for which this appropriation was voted, that not a single hospital or a single hospital room had been completed February 13, 1922, according to a chart officially issued to me from the consultants on hospitalization, and which chart is entitled on the headlines thereof, "Progress Report of Consultants on Hospitalization," and which title is certainly a misnomer if the usual meaning is to be attached to the word "progress."

It is interesting to read from this chart, under the headlines "Remarks," the various explanations offered by the consultants on hospitalization for their absolute failure to provide a single additional hospital up to the date mentioned under this appropriation.

I desire in this connection in order to emphasize the unspeakably sad and disgraceful conditions which have resulted from this culpable delay and incompetency on the part of the consultants on hospitalization, as is evidenced by the bare facts in the case, to state that as a result of the failure of the consultants on hospitalization to grasp the great importance of their vast problem, and on account of their evident incompetence, that there is now a crisis in the hospitalization of ex-service men, as will be shown by the facts and figures, to be referred to later.

The fact is, according to the official report of the consultants on hospitalization of the Treasury Department, that not one single hospital bed is available under the $18,600,000 appropriation for which they were responsible for providing hospitals speedily.

I have here and hold in my hand an official chart issued by the consultants on hospitalization of the Treasury Department, which is, curiously enough, denominated "the progress chart." "The progress chart" will be interesting to analyze. The facts are that when "the progress chart" is analyzed it shows all sorts of flimsy excuses, all sorts of ridiculous explanations; explanations like this one, in the case of the metropolitan district of New York City, under the head of "Remarks"; on the progress of a hospital in that great metropolitan district there is a blank. The minds of the consultants on hospitals must have been much of the time a blank. Under the head of some other hospital projects, under the head of the hospital proposed at Marion, Ind., for example, occurs, "New bids were approved February 2, 1922." We find that they have made wonderful progress in the State of Ohio, in which State there has been a farming-out system which has been a disgrace to the community and to which I shall refer later. We find that in that State they have made wonderful progress with the proposed hospital there, which is indicated here in the words, "Excavation completed."

I charge them with incompetency, with culpable neglect.

In various other projects, of which there are many, I find similar excuses and flimsy explanations. Therefore their report, which is designated a "progress chart," is evidently a misnomer.

It is interesting to consider some further facts which I desire to emphasize in this serious situation.

In addition to my own personal investigations in this matter and to bring out the facts showing a condition constituting a national disgrace I here refer to letters addressed to me by Col. R. C. Forbes, Director of the United States Veterans' Bureau; to the letter of John Thomas Taylor, vice chairman of the legislative committee of the American Legion; and to a personal letter and telegram from Col. Cornelius W. Wickersham, chairman of the hospital committee of the American Legion, Department of New York, New Jersey, and Connecticut; and also to a public statement of Robert S. Marx, national commander of the Disabled American Veterans of the World War, which last-named statement, dated January 11, 1922, I quote in part as follows—and to this statement I refer for further details as to the shocking conditions connected with the "farming out" system:

"INADEQUATE TREATMENT IN OHIO.

"We represent that in the State of Ohio to-day—

"First. The Government of the United States has provided no hospital facilities of any kind to care for mentally disabled ex-service men.

"Second. That the United States has farmed out the insane ex-service men of Ohio to State asylums which are notoriously overcrowded, undermanned, and inadequately equipped to treat and care for them.

"Third. That, for example, in the Longview Asylum, of Hamilton County, Ohio, there are 42 gallant soldiers who broke down mentally under the stress of war, although Longview is so overcrowded that 240 of the inmates sleep on the floor like cattle every night.

"Fourth. That although approximately one-half of the 250 mentally disabled soldiers now in Ohio asylums could be restored to reason by proper medical treatment and hospital care for their mental diseases, these men are given no medical treatment of any kind for their mental diseases, and curable cases are being daily doomed to permanent insanity.

"Fifth. That the tubercular and nontubercular patients in these institutions are not separated, but are all mixed together.

"Sixth. Finally, we represent that the State of Ohio is making a profit averaging $300 a year for every ex-service man confined in Ohio asylum, which profit is made from the money paid by the United States Government to the State.

"The truth of these charges is frankly admitted by the officials of the State institutions.

"Dr. E. W. North, superintendent of Longview Asylum, in a public statement issued December 28, 1921, said, 'These statements are not exaggerated in any particular.'

"Dr. H. S. MacAyeal, director of the State welfare department, said in a public statement issued December 30, 1921, that the State of Ohio made the profit shown by the following table on each insane soldier in its institutions, namely:

Institutions.	Cost per man.	Received from United States.	Profit made by State per man per year.
Athens State Hospital	$277.86	$547.50	$376.66
Cleveland State Hospital	238.24	547.50	309.26
Dayton State Hospital	309.54	547.50	237.96
Lima State Hospital	310.75	547.50	236.75
Masillon State Hospital	234.20	547.50	304.30
Longview State Hospital	231.28	547.50	316.22
Toledo State Hospital	286.86	547.50	260.64
Ohio Hospital for Epileptics	332.69	547.50	214.81
Institution for Feeble Minded	220.57	547.50	329.93

"The State of Ohio makes a profit of more than $125,000 annually by reason of ex-service men in Ohio asylums.

"What is true in Ohio is true in practically every State in the Union, because of the failure of the United States to provide adequate facilities for the medical care and hospitalization of our mentally disabled comrades.

"The national magnitude of the problem may be grasped from the fact that almost one-third (27 per cent) of all sick soldiers now in hospitals are mental cases.

"Moreover, for every mentally afflicted soldier in any institution to-day there is another soldier who should be receiving treatment, but whose family will not consent to have him adjudged a 'pauper insane' and sent to one of these State asylums for the pauper or criminal insane, which are the only places now available. If the Government had proper hospitals, these men who now form the unseen army of neglected insane would soon come forth, and half of them could be restored to useful citizenship. We charge that not only are these cases totally neglected but that in thousands of cases the United States Government has farmed out its responsibility to care for its own fighters who broke down mentally because of their service."

I desire to emphasize particularly some of the foregoing statements of Commander Marx, notably that "approximately one-half of the disabled soldiers now in Ohio asylums could be restored to reason and health by proper medical treatment and hospital care for their metal disease."

It is a well-known medical fact that active and proper treatment must be given to insane and neuropsychiatric cases as well as to tubercular cases during the first two years of the duration of their disease if they are to be prevented from becoming totally incurable and deteriorating into hopeless cases.

In this same connection I quote from a telegram to me from Col. C. W. Wickersham, dated March 7, 1922, chairman hospitalization committee of the second hospital district—New York, New Jersey, and Connecticut—as follows:

"Answering your telegram, situation in New York very bad. We have no tubercular hospital nor Government mental hospital here. Fox Hills Hospital is a miserable collection of war shack buildings wholly improper, particularly for tubercular and mental cases. Polyclinic hospital being abandoned. Catholic orphanage hospital not yet opened. Two thousand tubercular and mental cases in second district in contract hospitals, including 200 in State hospital for insane on Wards Island. Of 30,000 patients in the country at large 20,000 are mental and tubercular. Public Health Service has no mental hospital yet except St. Elizabeths in Washington, which is largely filled. Greatly lacking in tubercular beds. Am forwarding statement which will be of value.

"C. W. WICKERSHAM."

I also quote the concluding portion of a statement made by Colonel Wickersham March 4, 1922, as follows:

"The sufferings of our disabled and sick comrades in the past and the great delays in giving them proper hospitalization, prompt and just disability compensation, and timely and adequate vocational training demand that we devote our efforts to the future, with the experience gained since the armistice, to lighten and relieve the hardships they have suffered, rather than to endeavor to minimize facts and cover failure. Let us face a bad situation squarely and use our best endeavors to provide a remedy.

"C. W. WICKERSHAM,
"Chairman Hospital Committee, American Legion,
"Department of New York."

Some of the results of this crisis in hospitalization of ex-service men have been referred to frequently in the newspapers, but more specifically by responsible persons in position to know the full facts as to the wretched conditions among many of the sick ex-service men in State and privately owned hospitals, whose chief interest in these wards of the Government is a mercenary commercial interest.

I wish to be perfectly fair and to make acknowledgment to these State and privately owned hospitals which have provided efficient and proper treatment to the ex-service men, whom they have cared for with great inconvenience and difficulty because of the overcrowding in most of these hospitals.

How may we get the best results in hospitalizing and humanely caring for our ex-service men? We have a duty as Representatives in Congress that extends beyond the necessary appropriation of millions of dollars for hospitals and such facilities. Ours is also the sacred duty of safeguarding the expenditure of these millions so as to secure actual results and prevent the money appropriated from being foolishly or improperly expended, as it is proposed to expend a part of the available $18,600,000 appropriation.

Mr. HAYDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KINDRED. I gladly yield to the gentleman from Arizona.

Mr. HAYDEN. Are any steps being taken to acquire new hospitals in New York for the treatment of tubercular patients?

Mr. KINDRED. There has been a very singular step taken in the State of New York to acquire a site for a hospital for the treatment of tubercular patients. As I am reliably and officially informed, the consultants on hospitalization of the Treasury Department are negotiating now for the acquiring as a site of a hospital for the care and treatment of tubercular patients the celebrated farm of Ex-Gov. Levi P. Morton, which was no doubt a fine show farm for blooded cattle, but which is located in the damp Hudson River Valley, where sore throats and colds and pneumonia and consequent tuberculosis are not uncommon, and which farm is practically at sea level. The price at which that farm is held is $400,000. It was a beautiful and delightful show place, and it will probably make a charming residence for some of the higher-up consultants in this vast scheme of hospitals which it is proposed to adopt. [Applause.]

Tubercular patients, according to all medical authority, and as is also well known to the lay mind, require an altitude of not less than 2,000 feet above sea level, and this required altitude may be gotten within 20 miles of the Ex-Governor Morton Farm in the beautiful Catskill Mountains, or within 75 miles in the dry, elevated climate of the Adirondack Mountains. Why locate a hospital for tuberculosis patients in a damp river valley, practically at sea level?

Another plan in which the consultants on hospitalization are about to embark is the establishment of a hospital at Tuskegee, Ala., at which medical and surgical cases and neuropsychiatric cases, including mild nervous diseases and raving insane patients—all in one hospital plant, within a small area, with the excuse of giving near-by clinical material to the students of the Mahary Medical College for negro students. This mistaken and incompetent policy on the part of the consultants on hospitalization is in line with the experience of the State of New York in having wasted a million of dollars because a large hospital was started in a location which had to be abandoned, on the order of the highest court, for the reason that it was found impossible to provide proper sewerage.

The consultants on hospitalization, inexperienced in hospital management and practical policy, would ignore every principle and all experience in medical science for the welfare and care of the sick World War veterans in order to play practical politics and supply the negro medical students with clinical material at the expense of the welfare of these veterans.

It has been suggested that such suggestions as these as to hospitalization and hospital management is the reason why the American Legion at a recent meeting recorded its opposition to Brig. Gen. Dr. Charles E. Sawyer, chairman of the Federal Hospitalization Advisory Committee, who is reported in officially planning the management and policy of the magnificent Federal hospital system which we have so liberally provided for, to have ignored the Surgeon General of the United States Public Health Service, the Surgeon General of the United States Army, and the Surgeon General of the United States Navy, all of whom are members of the Hospitalization Advisory Committee, who, as stated before, are experienced and profoundly learned in medicine and all the details of hospital management and policy.

If Congress wants to properly settle this all-important question as to the control of the policy of hospital management of the great hospital system which we intend to establish, it should safeguard that question and also safeguard the enormous appropriations we have made and intend to make by providing that the policy of hospital management should be in control of the Surgeon General of the United States Public Health Service or of a board consisting of that official and of the Surgeon General of the United States Army and the Surgeon General of the United States Navy, these distinguished medical officers of the United States Government having coped with this and similar problems before, during, and since the World War. In addition to these, Congress might well provide that if, in the discretion of the President of the United States, additional competent medical specialists, experienced in hospital management, were required, the President should appoint them from among the most distinguished physicians in this country.

In this connection it is interesting to read from the article referred to in the American Legion Weekly on "The hospital-program crisis," as follows:

"The American Legion has insisted at these hearings that the mistakes and delays experienced in the $18,600,000 program shall be avoided in the new program. Chairman Sprague, of the Legion's rehabilitation committee, has indorsed the proposal contained in the Langley bill, that Director Forbes, of the Veterans' Bureau, shall have sole charge of the whole new program. He has opposed the suggestion that the Federal Board of Hospitalization, headed by the President's personal representative, Brig. Gen. Charles E. Sawyer, shall have jurisdiction in the new program.

"Mr. Sprague has contended that the history of the $18,600,000 appropriation is eloquent testimony that divided authority is the father of the two bureaucratic twins—delay and red tape—and that only by giving Director Forbes full authority to select sites and design and build hospitals in the quickest time possible can the mistakes of the past be avoided. Director Forbes, speaking for himself, has told the congressional committee that he believes that inasmuch as the responsibility for making use of the new buildings rests upon him, he should have absolute authority in determining where those hospitals shall be and what they shall be like. The congressional committee has shown that it agrees with the main proposals of the $17,000,000 appropriation bill. At this writing, however, it is still uncertain whether the White committee will be authorized to assist Director Forbes or whether the committee will grant the request of Brigadier General Sawyer and give his committee advisory jurisdiction."

Relative to Chairman Sprague's testimony as to the bad results of the existing divided authority, it should be stated that the architects of the Treasury Department have also been insistently charged with inexcusable delay and red tape, especially in connection with their system of purchasing materials and hiring labor—the so-called hiring and purchase system—which system, it is reasonably claimed by John Thomas Taylor, vice chairman of the hospitalization committee of the American Legion, in a personal letter to me, has not brought about the completion of hospital construction as rapidly as it would have been brought about if this construction work were placed under contract to responsible bidders by the architects of the Treasury Department, with a severe penalty for failure to complete the work on time.

The representatives of the architects of the Treasury Department, after their alleged failure to efficiently expedite hospital construction, appeared before the Committee on Buildings and Grounds and argued that the $17,000,000 appropriation to be authorized under the Langley bill should be placed under the sole direction of the Treasury Department instead of being appropriated to the Director of the Veterans' Bureau or to some other governmental agency than the Treasury Department.

All this, together with some other known and unknown facts, will explain that there has been recently quite a jealousy between certain governmental departments as to who should have the honor and privilege of expending the seventeen millions to be authorized by the Langley bill for additional hospitals.

It is not only of the utmost importance that these immense appropriations should be expended by the most efficient governmental departments, but it is also a matter of grave importance as to whether or not competent governmental medical officials are to control the management and policy of these hospitals after they are occupied by our disabled war veterans; and I wish to say, with a knowledge of hospital management and policy, that it would be indeed a calamity to the ex-service men and to our Nation if the management and general policy of these hospitals, after they are completed, are intrusted to incompetent and visionary physicians or other governmental officials who may have good intentions but who are merely inexperienced dreamers in the practical workings of the administration and policy of a great hospital system.

Congress should prepare now to meet the hospital needs which will be acute during the next several years. During this period approximately 11,000 hospital beds owned by the Government and which are old and unfit will have to be abandoned, and this number of new modern hospital beds provided. Besides this number, an additional number of hospitals will have to be provided to care for the increase in neuropsychiatric and tubercular patients, which increase during the next four to six years, based on the ratio of increase during the past two years, will be approximately 10,000 to 11,000 cases.

Still an additional number of hospital beds will have to be provided to meet the present program for the additional 6,000 hospital beds recommended by the Director of the Veterans' Bureau.

To sum up, in addition to this number and to the total number of hospital beds now owned and rented by the Government—30,000—approximately 20,000 additional hospital beds will be needed in the next several years in order to meet the needs of the approximately 56,000 patients who will require hospitalization at the end of that period, including the rapid increase in neuropsychiatric and tubercular cases during the next several years. I believe we should have them in mind and safeguard the appropriations which we shall be called upon very soon to make in addition to those already made for this purpose; to safeguard the appropriations and to protect the welfare of the ex-service men in some manner to be suggested by our most experienced legislators.

In connection with the shortage of hospitals and the abandonment of Fox Hills and other unfit Government hospitals, it is pointed out, to the personal knowledge of myself and many others, that the enforced transfers of many patients from one hospital to another has resulted in many avoidable deaths, this being particularly true in tubercular cases, where such transfers in all kinds of weather and other unfavorable conditions cause an exacerbation of their diseases from exposure and fatigue.

This fact is emphasized by the intention to abandon Fox Hills Hospital, New York, and the consequent necessity to find hospital accommodations for 400 tubercular patients, many of whom are bedridden and whom it is intended, according to reports, to remove from the vicinity of their old homes and families to California and North Carolina, although it appears vacant hospital beds for that number can be found in the salubrious climate of Saranac and Liberty, N. Y., places peculiarly adapted to the treatment of tuberculosis.

From these facts as to the inadequacy of the number of hospital beds and proper facilities for neuropsychiatric and also tubercular cases, which inadequacy at this time, three years and three months after the armistice which ended the World War, is due to the neglect and incompetency of the governmental agencies already referred to, it will be seen that these wards are not only denied the humanitarian treatment to which they are entitled as deserving wards of the Nation but that even from an economic standpoint the Government is failing to keep faith and do its duty toward its wards, our war veterans.

Let us, as the people's Representatives in Congress, continue our liberal policy toward the disabled ex-service men and provide them with the best possible hospital facilities and care, but after we have made liberal appropriations of millions of dollars let us see to it that additional modern hospitals are promptly completed and that the people's money for this noble purpose is not wasted in any foolish experiments. [Applause.]

In addition to the undeniable and disgraceful facts set forth in my speech delivered on March 17, 1922, I wish to emphasize that both the former and present Directors of the Veterans' Bureau seem to be inclined never to give the benefit of the doubt to those sick ex-service men whose illness—although undoubtedly due to their service—developed after the period during which they could under existing laws claim hospitalization and medical treatment. As an example: I have as a physician seen and had my attention called to many cases of insanity, spinal-cord disease, tuberculosis, and other diseases which developed their first discernible symptoms some time after the lapse of the period during which they could, under the existing law, claim hospitalization and medical treatment from the United States Government. Instead of looking upon these cases with a generous interpretation of the law, the officials of the Veterans' Bureau, and the whole policy of the United States Government, is seemingly in the direction of excluding these unfortunate cases from the benefits of hospitalization and medical treatment, so generously provided for them in many large appropriations made by Congress, and for which I have had the pleasure of voting. This class of patients have been denied hospitalization, even though there are now hundreds of vacant beds in Government hospitals, which have finally, after all of these years of delay, been completed and equipped and are running at great expense to benefit only, in some cases, very few inmates or patients.

It is my purpose at the present session of Congress to offer amendments to existing laws which will give to every ex-service man and woman who has been honorably discharged from any branch of the military or naval service of the United States the full benefits of hospitalization and medical treatment and good care at the expense of the Government, regardless of the diseases which they may have developed and also regardless of the time when the disease is developed. In other words, our ex-service men and women should have the privilege of hospital care and the best possible treatment when they are disabled by sickness or by any other cause, and in my opinion the Government will fall short of doing its plain duty until the present laws are so changed as to give the most liberal and fair treatment to our ex-soldiers and sailors of all branches of the service.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Clerk read as follows:

Contingent expenses: For miscellaneous items and expenses of special and select committees, exclusive of salaries and labor, unless specifically ordered by the House of Representatives, fiscal year 1923, $13,086.98.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MADDEN: Page 3, after line 6, insert as a new paragraph the following:

"For stationery for Representatives, Delegates, and Resident Commissioners, $750."

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I want to say in connection with this amendment that six Members of the House died and their stationery accounts were either drawn up to the limit or, according to law, paid to the widow of the deceased Member or the proper heir. This is to supply stationery to five Members who have been elected to fill vacancies and to provide the allowance where one vacancy exists and will probably soon be filled.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

AMERICAN BATTLE MONUMENTS COMMISSION.

For every expenditure requisite for and incident to the work of the American Battle Monuments Commission authorized by the act entitled "An act for the creation of an American Battle Monuments Commission to erect suitable memorials commemorating the services of the American soldier in Europe, and for other purposes," approved March 4, 1923, including the acquisition of land or interest in land in foreign countries for carrying out the purposes of the said act without submission to the Attorney General of the United States under the provisions of section 355 of the Revised Statutes; employment of personal services in the District of Columbia and elsewhere; the transportation of mileage of, reimbursement of actual travel expenses or per diem in lieu thereof to the personnel engaged upon the work of the commission, as authorized by law; the establishment of offices and the rent of office space in foreign countries; printing, engraving, lithographing, binding, photographing, and typewriting; and the actual expenses of the members of the commission and its secretary, $95,750, to remain available until June 30, 1925: Provided, That not exceeding $1,600 of the amount herein appropriated shall be available to meet such expenses of the commission as may have been incurred since March 4, 1923, and prior to the passage of this act, as may be approved by the chairman of the commission: Provided further, That when traveling with the commission or on the business of the commission officers of the Army serving as members or as secretary of the commission shall be reimbursed for actual expenses as provided for other members of the commission.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 6, line 11, after the word "commission," insert the following: "Provided further, That disbursements for expenditures outside of continental United States may be made by a special disbursing agent designated by the commission, and under such regulations as may be prescribed."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Hospital facilities and services: For further carrying out the provisions of the act entitled "An act to authorize an appropriation to enable the Director of the United States Veterans' Bureau to provide for the construction of additional hospital facilities and to provide medical, surgical, and hospital services and supplies for persons who served in the World War, the Spanish-American War, the Philippine insurrection, and the Boxer rebellion, and are patients of the United States Veterans' Bureau," approved April 20, 1922, $5,000,000, for which the Director of the United States Veterans' Bureau, subject to the approval of the President, was authorized to incur obligations by an act entitled "An act making an appropriation for additional hospital facilities for patients of the United States Veterans' Bureau," approved May 11, 1922.

Mr. WATKINS. I offer an amendment. Line 6, page 8, strike out "$5,000,000" and insert "$5,500,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 8, line 6, strike out the figures "$5,000,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$5,500,000."

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on that amendment. The amount of $17,000,000 was the limit of cost for these hospitals. Of that sum, $12,000,000 was appropriated and $5,000,000 was given as a contract authorization. We are here appropriating the $5,000,000 obligated under the contract authorization. We can not exceed the amount authorized by law. I make the point of order.

Mr. WATKINS. I simply desired to get more money for this purpose. I do not care to argue the point of order. I am ready for the Chair to rule.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

The Clerk read as follows:

Administration of the United States warehouse act: To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to carry into effect the provisions of the United States warehouse act, approved August 11, 1916, as amended by the act of February 23, 1923, including the payment of such rent outside of the District of Columbia and the employment of such persons and means as the Secretary of Agriculture may deem necessary, in the city of Washington and elsewhere, $10,000.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I do that for the purpose of asking the chairman of the committee, recurring back to page 13, and I desire to ask how much of that appropriation is left and is being appropriated?

Mr. MADDEN. About $38,000, and we figure that will clean up these infestations up or down, whichever way you may use the term.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment is withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

COLLECTION OF SEED-GRAIN LOANS.

For an additional amount to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to collect moneys due the United States on account of loans made under the seed-grain loan provisions of the act of March 3, 1921, and the seed-grain loan act of March 20, 1922, including the employment of such persons and means in the city of Washington and elsewhere as may be necessary, $13,000.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 15, after line 17, insert:

"ERADICATION OF FOOT-AND-MOUTH DISEASE.

"For personal services and other expenditures in the District of Columbia and elsewhere in connection with the arrest and eradication of foot-and-mouth disease, rinderpest, contagious pleuropneumonia, or other contagious or infectious disease of animals, including the payment of claims growing out of past and future purchases and destruction, in cooperation with the States, of animals affected by or exposed to, or of materials contaminated by or exposed to, any such disease, wherever found and irrespective of ownership, under like or substantially similar circumstances, when such owner has complied with all lawful quarantine regulations, and including necessary investigations, to determine whether such diseases have been completely eradicated in districts where they previously existed, $1,000,000, to be expended by the Secretary of Agriculture when in his judgment an emergency exists which threatens the livestock industry of the country, and to remain available until June 30, 1925: Provided, That the payment for animals hereafter purchased may be made on an appraisement based on the meat, dairy, or breeding value; but in case of appraisement based on breeding value, no appraisement of any animal shall exceed three times its meat or dairy value; and except in case of an extraordinary emergency, to be determined by the Secretary of Agriculture, the payment by the United States Government for any animal shall not exceed one-half of any such appraisement."

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, several years ago we had a serious epidemic of foot-and-mouth disease throughout the country among cattle, hogs, sheep, and goats. A large amount of money was appropriated—some $2,500,000—during the worst period. Three hundred thousand dollars of that $2,500,000 remained unexpended and was available to cope with existing conditions. It developed without much warning that in the counties of Alameda, Contra Costa, and Salano, Calif., there were 64 premises on which cattle numbering 2,742, hogs numbering 7,610, sheep 8, and goats 24 had become infected with the foot-and-mouth disease. The further spread of this disease would be serious and alarming.

The Department of Agriculture, in connection with the State of California and the counties that I have named, took immediate steps to prevent the spread and killed the cattle, hogs, sheep, and goats and buried them. The process through which they go in cases of this sort is to kill the animals affected, bury them in deep trenches, and cover them with quicklime, so there is no chance whatever for further infection from those animals. The disease spreads without respect to whether or not the cattle are moved from place to place. A man working on a farm can carry this disease in his clothing, and so it becomes necessary to quarantine those who are in close proximity to the places where the infected animals are located. Birds carry the disease from place to place, and sometimes this disease breaks out in a given place and a few days afterwards it will be found many miles away from there, without any apparent cause. Hay in stacks becomes infected, and cattle eating that hay later become afflicted with the disease. There have been cases known where cattle had been feeding on a field of alfalfa, where they have had a slight affliction. They have left the disease on the alfalfa field, and when the alfalfa was made into hay and fed to other cattle, later on those other cattle became afflicted. So it becomes very important that drastic measures be taken promptly to obviate the spread of the disease.

They have already killed more than 800 cattle and 2,000 hogs in the counties that I have named. They have done everything within their power to prevent the further spread of the disease. There has been no disease of this kind in the United States among cattle for some years past to speak of. In European countries they have this disease constantly among their cattle, and also in the Orient. But here it is found to be much cheaper to eradicate the disease by killing the cattle and paying for them than by attempting to cure them.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Chairman, I have taken my feet to move a pro forma amendment, to strike out the last word on line 17 of page 15; or is it too late?

Mr. MADDEN. That is all right.

Mr. LUCE. This is the item entitled, "Collection of seed grain loans." In view of the constant and growing pressure for the lending of the public funds to individual citizens of the country, I suggest that the chairman of the committee might throw some helpful light upon the situation if he would explain the purposes of this paragraph and perhaps spread upon the RECORD what are the actual results of the lending of the taxpayers' money to individual members of the community.

Mr. MADDEN. Briefly, the financial transactions under this appropriation are these: In 1921, $1,957,000 was loaned to 13,935 farmers, of which amount $1,441,000 has been collected up to December 31, 1923, together with $34,000 in interest.

In 1922 the sum of $1,480,000 was loaned to 12,142 farmers. Of the amount loaned, $1,033,218 has been collected to December 31, 1923, together with $42,000 interest. The total amount loaned in the two years was $3,437,000, of which $2,256,000, or 65.5 per cent, has been repaid. That includes the interest on both loans to December 31, 1923. The amount appropriated in this paragraph is intended to pay the cost of the effort to make further collections.

Mr. LUCE. Is it expected that any considerable amount can be further collected?

Mr. MADDEN. The only information we have is that about $140,000 will be collected as the result of the expenditure of this money during the next year.

Mr. LUCE. Then, would it be fair to say that the House may assume that whenever it lends the taxpayers' money to individuals it is likely to get back only two-thirds of it?

Mr. MADDEN. It is fair to say that the Government will not get back much more than we have received, except $140,000 in this case.

Mr. TINCHER. What was the character of that loan?

Mr. MADDEN. It was a bill passed by both Houses of Congress; a bill reported from the Committee on Agriculture of the House, to meet a very pressing and urgent demand for seeds to be supplied to farmers in some cases, and to loan the money to them, with which to buy cattle, as I recall, and seeds. They have had a number of years of serious drought and great difficulty, living in sections of the country where trouble has come from time to time; and in doing this I will say that North Dakota and Montana were the principal locations where the money was loaned. In doing this we have only done what we have frequently done in cases of trouble across the sea, where we have no personal interest in the people involved.

Mr. TINCHER. The gentleman will recall that it was freely predicted at the time the loan was made that it would be practically a gift, and there would be no collections?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes. I am amazed that so much has been collected as we have collected.

Mr. LUCE. If two-thirds only has been repaid and one-third remains to be collected, would it follow that in one-third of these cases we were unable to save afflicted persons from ruin?

Mr. MADDEN. I think their case was worse than they themselves foresaw. Drought followed, and hardship after hardship was endured by the farmers.

They thought they could recover from the difficulty and thought they were better off than they really were. When we loaned them money to buy more seed with which to grow other crops other failures came. They had no control over the situation, and it was impossible for them to meet the obligation. But they did wonderfully well. There was an effort made by all to do the best they could, and I think they did very well.

Mr. LUCE. The point which strikes me is that perhaps in this instance we did not follow the wisest course.

Mr. MADDEN. The Government still has mortgages on the crops of these people.

Mr. LUCE. But if it is not expected that more than two-thirds can be collected——

Mr. MADDEN. I judge that from the evidence I elicited in the examination of the witnesses.

Mr. LUCE. I wondered whether we were pursuing the wisest course in dispensing our charity in this fashion and whether some more efficient method could not have been found to help these people.

Mr. MADDEN. There has been some doubt in the minds of many as to whether this was the wisest course, but the wisdom of the House was expressed in its almost overwhelming vote on this proposition, so that there was nothing left for us to do but deal with the situation and appropriate the money.

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment. I want to say that I commend the House of Representatives for the passage of the law which permitted those loans to be made.

I will say for the benefit of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE] that the general policy of lending the taxpayers' money to distressed citizens may not appeal on its face to the general taxpayer, but, as a matter of fact, the farmers in those localities have greater difficulties to overcome than you find in the ordinary agricultural community. That is to say, these conditions are not brought about by their own indiscretion; they are not brought about by their own conduct, as a rule. The conditions arise out of seasons over which they have no control.

This aid materially helped these people to go on with their farm business and carry on their occupations, so that they could exist and not become objects of charity and so they could still maintain their self-respect as citizens of a great country.

When a great calamity comes to some foreign country we pass legislation appropriating money to them without a word, and without question we appropriate it out of the Treasury of the United States. But when our own citizens, through misfortune and under circumstances over which they have no control, come to us we immediately become beggarly with them, and we withhold from them the help which we should give, on the ground that we are taking the taxpayers' money to lend to individuals of the country, which is not, as some say, a proper function of the Government. But very much good has been done in these cases. To-day, while I am talking to you, there are places in the United States where farmers are in most distressful situations.

They have had all of their machinery, their lands, and all of their foodstuffs sold under power of sales in mortgages, and they are without any means whatever to carry on their business.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McKEOWN. Yes.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I could not hear the gentleman because he has been talking toward the other side; but do I understand the gentleman indorses the action taken in loaning this money to the farmers?

Mr. McKEOWN. Yes.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Does the gentleman think this Government has any constitutional right to take the money of the taxpayers and loan it to any set of individuals in any particular section of the country to the exclusion of others who need it, in the gentleman's own State as well as in mine?

Mr. McKEOWN. I think it is within the meaning of the Constitution and within the constitutional power of the Congress of the United States to make loans to its own needy citizens as much as it is within the power of the Congress to loan money to foreign citizens and contribute to foreign countries when they are in distress.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Would the gentleman say that because in one State the farmers need money with which to buy seed they should be favored with a loan and farmers in other States denied that money?

Mr. McKEOWN. I think the Government should take care of its needy citizens whenever it is practicable to do so.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for three additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent to proceed for three additional minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. McKEOWN. Now, let me show you what the situation is. You talk about giving money away. We loan money to the railroads with lavish hands. We loaned them money which we had in the Treasury and which we did not have in the Treasury, in order to help them out of their trials and their tribulations, and to-day, before the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, they are asking us to make additional loans to the great commerce of the country. Why should we pick out these men and make them special beneficiaries and not make loans to farmers in some of the States where they need money and when they need help to put them on their feet and sustain the greatest industry we have in America, and upon which depends the final prosperity of all the country? It is not demagogic to say that difficulties will result if we do not do something by way of rendering financial assistance to these people who are absolutely in the throes of poverty and through no fault of their own. Whenever the Government does not function and help that class of citizens, so necessary to the prosperity of the country and yet in such poverty, they are apt to feel they do not live in a free and generous country, especially when they can pick up the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and read where we are lavish in our expenditures in the way of increasing salaries and in the creation of additional offices.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR.
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY.

Care and custody of the insane of Alaska: For care and custody of persons legally adjudged insane in Alaska, including transportation and other expenses, fiscal year 1923, $500: Provided, That authority is granted to the Secretary of the Interior to pay from this appropriation to the Sanitarium Co., of Portland, Oreg., not to exceed $600 per capita per annum for the care and maintenance of Alaskan insane patients during the fiscal year 1923.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

At my request, Mr. Chairman, for a constituent of mine, the Secretary of the Interior, Dr. Hubert Work, prepared and sent to me for transmission to my constituent a statement upon the leasing of the naval petroleum reserves. I think it is a very valuable addition to what has been said upon that subject, and I ask that I may have it printed in connection with my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the manner indicated. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The communication referred to follows:

THE SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, March 12, 1924.

Hon. L. C. DYER,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. DYER: I have your note of March 1 asking me to furnish you the information requested by Mr. Schmid in his letter to you of February 28, which I return with this.

I am inclosing a memorandum which gives the facts as nearly as possible in a noncontroversial form. I trust it will serve your purpose.

Very truly yours,

HUBERT WORK.

Without entering into such disputed questions as to whether or not the naval petroleum reserves should have been leased, or if they were to be leased, whether it should have been done in the particular manner adopted, the following summary of what return the Navy received and is to receive for the leases has been prepared from the printed record of the Senate committee hearings:

1. Royalties ranging according to the average daily production of the wells from 12½ to 35 per cent in the case of the California naval lease and 12½ to 50 per cent in case of the Wyoming naval lease. Royalties on Government land generally range from 12½ to 25 per cent, and on leases growing out of prospecting permits 5 per cent flat on one-quarter of the area, as prescribed in the law, and from 12½ to 33⅓ per cent on the balance. A few special leases in the Salt Creek field, which belongs to the Government and is adjacent to the Teapot naval reserve in Wyoming, are at 33⅓ per cent. With the same average daily production per well the naval leases would yield more to the Navy than Government leases. In California the royalty actually accrued to date in reserve No. 1, nearly all of which was leased by contract, has been 32 per cent. From reserve No. 2, nearly all of which was leased at regulation royalties, the actual royalty received has been 18 per cent. In the Salt Creek field, under regular Government royalties except for the few premium leases already noted, the average actual royalty received has been to date 22 per cent in round figures. On the Teapot reserve, where the wells have so far come in with much smaller daily yields, the actual average has been just under 17 per cent. The Osage Indian lands are leased at 12½ per cent to 16⅔ per cent, and private lands generally pay 12½ per cent. Indian lands and private lands often bring, in addition to royalties, a lump-sum cash payment or bonus. In lieu of such bonus other considerations were obtained in the naval leases.

2. In lieu of cash bonus the Navy received a higher price for its oil from the Teapot reserve, amounting to 41 cents per barrel, which, on the estimated production when the lease was granted and the present royalty rate, would have been nearly $10,000,000, and even with the present expected production, which is about one-fifth that expected when the lease was made, will amount to more than all the cash bonus received from the whole of the Salt Creek leases.

3. In lieu of cash bonus for the California lease the Navy received from the Pan American Petroleum Co. many considerations, including in particular the agreement to furnish promptly fuel oil in storage constructed according to Navy designs and subject to Navy inspection to a value of approximately $20,000,000. The only repayment to be made is to be in the form of royalty oil if and as the reserves prove to contain oil and it is made available. If the reserves prove barren, the Navy gets the tanks and the fuel oil and the company has no claim on the Government.

4. Tanks and storage facilities are agreed to be furnished as directed by the Navy and filled with petroleum products without profit to the contractor to the full value of all royalty oils. Regardless of all technicalities, this work is in fact being done on contracts let under competitive bids approved in advance by the Navy, save for a few small pieces of special work being done as ordered by the Navy but without such bids.

5. Both contracts provide for building, without cost to the Government, of pipe lines to connect the lands with the sea. In the Mammoth contract right of transport of Government oil is secured even prior to that belonging to the owner of the pipe line. In the Pan American contract free transportation is given the Navy oils.

6. On the Atlantic coast the Navy gets, for 15 years, free storage of 3,000,000 barrels of fuel oil furnished by the contractor, and on the Pacific free storage of 1,000,000 barrels, with valuable free bunkering privileges.

7. The Navy may receive fuel oil for its royalty oil from the Teapot reserve at a ratio of exchange that is 5 per cent better than the average for the five years preceding the making of the lease. It also has a continuing option under which it may purchase other petroleum products at 10 per cent less than market prices.

8. It is not disputed that oil was being drained from each of the three reserves, the difference of opinion being merely as to how extensive the future drainage would be. Under a system of drilling on individual leases advertised and let on competitive bidding the Navy was always behind in the race, and the first and cheap production went to its neighbors, 22,000,000 barrels having been so abstracted from 25 border wells only. Under the contracts the lessees must drill instantly when the Navy directs in the western or larger part of the reserve.

9. Prior to making the contracts over $5,000,000 worth of royalty oil had been sold for cash from the reserves and the money turned into the Treasury, the Navy as such getting nothing. Under the contracts the value of all the royalty oil goes to the Navy, as would seem to be the intent of Congress in setting aside for the Navy such reserves as that of the Teapot, which does not produce any fuel oil as such. The Teapot oil could never be used by the Navy except as the equivalent of so much cash to exchange for fuel oil, petroleum products, or storage.

10. By the contracts the Navy got, in lieu of a reserve of crude oil in the ground, which was certainly being diminished by drainage, which could only be made available in emergency, at enormous expense and after a lapse of one or two years' time, an actual reserve of fuel oil in steel tanks at naval bases. The amount already provided at Pearl Harbor is, in the expressed opinion of naval experts, enough to double the efficiency of the Pacific Fleet and insure the coast States from invasion.

The Clerk read as follows:

Gila River Reservation, Ariz.: For completing the construction by the Indian Service of a dam with a bridge superstructure and the necessary controlling works for diverting water from the Gila River for the irrigation of Indian land and Indian allotments on the Gila River Indian Reservation, Ariz., as recommended by the Board of Engineers of the United States Army in paragraph 217 of its report to the Secretary of War of February 14, 1914, $300,000, to remain available until June 30, 1925, reimbursable as provided in section 2 of the act of August 24, 1912 (37 Stat. L. p. 522).

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I would like to ask the chairman if this is a new project—the Gila River project?

Mr. MADDEN. No.

Mr. McKEOWN. Then what is the necessity for appropriating this amount of money, $300,000?

Mr. MADDEN. This is an old project, authorized a long while ago, in 1916. The limit of cost was $400,000. The river was about 1,400 feet wide when they began construction and it turned out to be about 2,600 feet wide a little later. I think there was a good deal of negligence in connection with the construction of the dam at this point or the work would not have been delayed as much as it was. Three hundred and eighty-five thousand dollars of the $400,000 originally appropriated has been expended on the dam, and the question now is whether we should go on and complete the dam or allow that which has already been expended to go to waste.

Mr. McKEOWN. I just wanted to know if there had been that much of a mistake made——

Mr. MADDEN. There has been that much of a mistake, but it was due largely to the cause I have indicated.

Mr. MORTON D. HULL. Why did not this appear in the regular appropriation bill for the Interior Department?

Mr. MADDEN. This is a deficiency bill and this was not presented to Congress at that time.

Mr. MORTON D. HULL. At the time the other bill was being made up?

Mr. MADDEN. No; it was not, and therefore they could not have considered it. It would have been put in if it had been presented.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment is withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

BUREAU OF EDUCATION.

Education of natives of Alaska: Of any unexpended balances of appropriation for specific objects included under the appropriation "Education of natives of Alaska, 1923 and 1924," a sum not exceeding $12,000 may be applied to the payment of "Freight, including operation of the U. S. S. Boxer," in addition to the $19,000 allotted for that purpose for that year.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to pass over the first two items on page 22, being lines 1 to 8. I would like to prepare a limitation on the expenditure of that money. We have some information which leads us to think we ought to have such a limitation.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to pass over the first two paragraphs on page 22, being lines 1 to 8, inclusive. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Clerk read as follows:

Salaries and expenses of district attorneys: For salaries of United States district attorneys and expenses of United States district attorneys and their regular assistants, including the office expenses of United States district attorneys in Alaska, and for salaries of regularly appointed clerks to United States district attorneys for services rendered during vacancy in the office of the United States district attorney, fiscal year 1923, $18,754.28: Provided, That United States district attorneys and their regular assistants may be granted a per diem of not to exceed $4 in lieu of subsistence, instead of, but under the conditions prescribed for, the present allowance for actual expenses of subsistence.

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I want to ask the chairman of the committee why it is there is only $4 per day allowed here to the United States district attorney while in the revenue bill which was passed a few days ago there was provided for traveling expenses not less than $7 a day. There ought to be some rule by which these different departments should have the same allowance.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The law provides for $4.

Mr. MADDEN. This is a deficiency bill for 1923. The year has already closed. The obligation was created and they did not have money enough to meet the obligation.

Mr. McKEOWN. I understand that so far as this bill is concerned they could only make it the amount the Government owed them?

Mr. MADDEN. Certainly.

Mr. McKEOWN. But I wanted to bring up the question of why there should not be a general level made for all the departments so there would be no discrimination.

Mr. MADDEN. I presume, quite likely, there should be a general level, but you know the job of our committee is not to invite extravagance but to prevent extravagance.

Mr. McKEOWN. I am simply calling the attention of the House to the fact that we do make a discrimination between the various departments.

Mr. MADDEN. It is very nice of the gentleman to call our attention to this, and we will try to keep them on a level, if we can; but keep them down to the lower level and not the higher one.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment is withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Penitentiary, McNeil Island, Washington: For drilling wells and providing necessary storage facilities for water, $60,000, to remain available until June 30, 1925.

For the construction of a scow and gridiron for the same, $4,500.

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Is that authorized for the penitentiary at McNeil Island?

Mr. MADDEN. The situation at McNeil Island Penitentiary is just like this: In the first place they have run out of water, and all the water they have to supply the needs of the institution is what they get from wells that are on land that has to be rented. These lands are rented only temporarily. Our wells have given out. This is a work in progress. It is a development of the institution that must be maintained.

Mr. McKEOWN. What depth are these wells to be?

Mr. MADDEN. Nobody knows how deep they will have to go. They have no water now.

Mr. McKEOWN. Has there been some estimate showing that $60,000 will be necessary for these wells?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. McKEOWN. It seems like a very large sum for that purpose.

Mr. MADDEN. They have to have storage tanks and a pipe line.

Mr. McKEOWN. Is the land limited where the penitentiary is located?

Mr. MADDEN. It is on an island, and they can drill for the wells only on that island. There are only two or three places where they can get any water at all now, and they do not know how deep they will have to go.

Mr. McKEOWN. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Navy Department——

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment which I sent to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. MADDEN offered the following amendment: On page 27, after line 19, insert as a new paragraph the following:

"The appropriation of $6,500,000 for making changes in the turret guns of certain battleships so as to increase the range of such guns, contained in the deficiency appropriation act, approved March 4, 1923, is hereby repealed."

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I call the attention of the committee to this situation. In the first place, the Navy Department came to the Committee on Appropriations and requested last year the sum of $6,500,000 with which to elevate the turret guns on battleships so as to increase their range. They came with the information that the turret guns on the English battleships had been elevated so as to give them a longer range, and that the $6,500,000 would enable them to place the turret guns on our battleships on an equality with the guns on the English battleships. The committee was rather doubtful about the wisdom of authorizing the appropriation. The Naval Affairs Committee had given some consideration to the question and they reported a bill favoring the appropriation, but the bill was not passed. We had some doubt, as I say, about the propriety of it under the treaty in respect to the limitation of armaments and we wrote in the appropriation a provision that the money would not be used if it was a violation of the treaty. I think it turned out that our fears were more than verified.

The information which the Navy Department had upon which the appropriation was based was erroneous. Secretary Hughes made the following statement:

In my speech at New Haven on December 29, 1922, I made the following statement with respect to alterations in the British capital ships:

"The result is that in a considerable number of British ships bulges have been fitted, elevations of turret guns increased, and turret loading arrangements modified to conform to the increased elevations.

"In making this statement I relied upon specific information which had been furnished by the Navy Department, and which, of course, the Navy Department believed to be entirely trustworthy.

"The Department of State has been advised by the British Government categorically 'that no alterations have been made in the elevation of the turret guns of any British capital ships since they were placed in commission,' and, further, 'that no additional deck protection has been provided since February 6, 1922, the date of the signing of the Washington treaty.'

"It gives me pleasure to make this correction, as it is desired that there should be no public misapprehension."

Acting Secretary Roosevelt assumed responsibility for the data used by Secretary Hughes, but declared it had been based "on information believed to be reliable by the department," and said:

"The Navy Department in the hearings before Congress stated that the elevation of the turret guns on the British capital ships had been and was being increased. This statement was based on information believed to be thoroughly reliable by the department.

"The British admiralty has informed the department that this is not the case, that the elevation of the turret guns on British capital ships is the same as when these ships were originally commissioned. This places the matter beyond further question, and the department takes pleasure in correcting its previous statement in consonance with the above."

Inasmuch as the money appropriated for the elevation of the turret guns was not used because of an order issued by the Secretary of the Navy and the President of the United States, and inasmuch as the Committee on Appropriations believed it should not be used until further action be taken by Congress, and believing further that the money was appropriated under a misapprehension, the committee now believes it ought to be repealed, and that is the purpose of this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For fiscal year 1923, $192,571.20.

Mr. BRIGGS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word in order to ask the chairman of the committee whether it is true that the service which the Post Office Department used to perform of supplying addresses in cities where the letters were inadequately addressed has been terminated. I have heard considerable about it, and not long ago some one advised me in connection with letters sent to different employees, even in the departments in Washington, that about 75 or more were returned on the ground that the addresses were insufficient, and they did not have time to look up the addresses. I do not know whether that came from departments other than the Post Office Department or whether it came through the Post Office Department itself. I have been informed that a service which used to be extremely valuable to the people of the United States of utilizing the directories in the various cities to supply inadequate addresses on letters has been discontinued. If that be true, I think steps should be taken to provide the Post Office Department with funds enough to restore the service.

Mr. MADDEN. I do not know whether that service has been discontinued, but it ought not to be discontinued.

Mr. BRIGGS. It ought not to be.

Mr. MADDEN. I would say further that there is no shortage of funds with which to perform the work. These large deficiency appropriations which are carried in this bill are due to this fact. We gave them practically every dollar that they asked in the Post Office Department for the years that these deficiencies existed; but last year, after we adjourned, the business of the Post Office Department, as did business generally throughout the country, increased very largely. They found themselves unable to conduct the business without putting on additional men.

They had to take the chances on doing that or stop the business, and while I think they may have violated the law, there was nothing else to do but violate the law or stop the business.

Mr. BRIGGS. I can appreciate the effort made to continue the service to the country and I think it was a very commendable one.

Mr. MADDEN. I will say to my friend from Texas, if there is any such practice that has been inaugurated to shut down the work of the directory service, which I think is invaluable, I would be very glad to cooperate with anybody to see that it is restored.

Mr. BRIGGS. I have understood it was so, and that unless the letter was addressed absolutely correctly in charge of the house, street, and number that an effort would not be made to deliver such letters, but they would be sent to the general delivery, and it has only recently come to my attention two different times——

Mr. MADDEN. I will be glad——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BRIGGS. I ask for two additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MADDEN. I will take the question up at once and find out and I will get a reply to the gentleman.

Mr. BRIGGS. I wish the gentleman would, because I am very much interested in this, and if it has been discontinued I desire to see it restored without delay, because I think it is invaluable to the people. It is easy enough for the local authorities to look up these people through such a service and see that such letters are delivered. I also want to say in this connection that I am strongly in favor of sufficient appropriations for the Post Office Department to carry out their delivery service, and for it not to be curtailed or hampered, as I understand it has been for months past.

Mr. MADDEN. Let me tell the gentleman about that. I would like to get that correct in the RECORD. It appears that the average increase in the postal business annually is from 5½ to 7 per cent. The increase in the expenses of the Post Office Department for two successive years was about 1½ per cent in one year and 2½ per cent in another, and it seems in their effort to respond to the retrenchment desire they did not increase the force fast enough to meet the growing needs of the business, so they found themselves in an embarrassing situation after Congress adjourned last year and they had to put on 3,200 more clerks, 2,788 carriers and 500 laborers, and these deficiencies are mostly due to that cause.

Mr. BRIGGS. I have not any objection to appropriations for that purpose; I rather feel the Post Office Department owes that to the people and the appropriation ought to be made.

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking the chairman a question. I would like to ask the chairman of the committee if there is any provision made for the Postal Service, or any appropriation made for the purpose of the various letter carriers in a city taking or making a record of all the citizens or voters, or whatever you might call it, on a particular route?

Mr. MADDEN. I do not think so.

Mr. AYRES. I know that was done in the city of Wichita last year.

Mr. MADDEN. I think that would be a violation of the civil-service regulations.

Mr. AYRES. That is just exactly what I think, and I wanted to know.

Mr. MADDEN. I think it would be and I am not in favor of it myself.

Mr. AYRES. It is done just the same.

Mr. MADDEN. I reprehend it, if that is the proper word.

Mr. AYRES. It is.

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

For vehicle allowance, the hiring of drivers, the rental of vehicles, and the purchase and exchange and maintenance, including stable and garage facilities, of wagons or automobiles for, and the operation of, screen-wagon and city delivery and collection service, $400,000: Provided, That the Postmaster General may, in his disbursement of this appropriation, apply a part thereof to the leasing of quarters for the housing of Government-owned automobiles at a reasonable annual rental for a term not exceeding 10 years.

Mr. TAYLOR of West Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking a question of the gentleman from Illinois with respect to allowance for rural carriers for equipment. Is there anything in any of the bills which provides an allowance for these carriers for equipment?

Mr. MADDEN. There is no law authorizing any allowance except the annual compensation. The gentleman, I think, refers to equipment. There is no law authorizing it.

Mr. TAYLOR of West Virginia. Is there any law contemplating that?

Mr. MADDEN. The Post Office Committee has that jurisdiction, and I understand they are now considering the propriety or recommending some legislation on the subject.

Mr. CARTER. They have been holding hearings for a week or 10 days. I suggest to the gentleman from West Virginia that the gentleman from Illinois is so familiar with the Post Office Department he can probably give some information.

Mr. MADDEN. I think they are considering it, and I do not know what the attitude will be. I am sure they have been holding hearings, and now I understand they are holding executive sessions to ascertain what kind of a bill should be reported.

Mr. TAYLOR of West Virginia. The reason of my inquiry is that a number of constituents in my district have written me about that.

Mr. MADDEN. I get a lot of letters every day about it.

The Clerk read as follows:

OFFICE OF THIRD ASSISTANT POSTMASTER GENERAL.

For payment of limited indemnity for the loss of registered articles in the international mails, in accordance with convention stipulations (Universal Postal Convention, signed May 20, 1906), fiscal year 1921, $10,000.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 31, lines 17 and 18, strike out "(Universal Postal Convention, signed May 29, 1906)."

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, the reason for suggesting that these words be stricken out is that there are other conventions in addition to the one signed in 1906 and we do not want it to appear to be restricted to this one.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

FEDERAL FARM LOAN BUREAU.

For salaries of two additional members of the Federal Farm Loan Board, appointed under authority of the act of March 4, 1923, fiscal year 1923, $4,055.57.

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I want to ask the chairman of the committee, Do we make appropriations to pay the salaries of the Farm Loan Board? Is there any provision made by which this money is refunded to the United States?

Mr. MADDEN. All.

Mr. McKEOWN. Comes out of the profits?

Mr. MADDEN. They make an assessment.

Mr. McKEOWN. I wanted to know——

Mr. MADDEN. They have not been doing it in the past, but they are doing it now.

Mr. McKEOWN. I am glad to know it, because they are now a paying proposition and independent of the Treasury.

Mr. MADDEN. And on their own basis.

Mr. McKEOWN. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

BUREAU OF INTERNAL REVENUE.

Refunding taxes illegally collected: For refunding taxes illegally collected under the provisions of sections 3220 and 3689, Revised Statutes, as amended by the acts of February 24, 1919, and November 23, 1921, including the payment of prior year claims, $105,467,000: Provided, That a report shall be made to Congress of the disbursements hereunder as required by the acts of February 24, 1919, and November 23, 1921.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, some days ago the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON] made a statement and extended his remarks in reference to certain bills which had been introduced, touching the modification of the prohibition enforcement act. The impression was made—not intentionally, of course—but in some respects at least it created the impression that those who favored that legislation were attacking the Constitution. I desire, if I may have permission, to extend my remarks and present an argument showing that such legislation as is called for in those bills, 2¾ per cent beer, is not attacking the Constitution.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DYER. Yes.

Mr. CRAMTON. Perhaps it is not a fair request for me to make, because the gentleman's bill was confined to 2.75 per cent beer. There was at the same time another group of bills calling for 4 per cent beer and 10 per cent wine. The request I am making may not be fair for the reason I have indicated. Would the gentleman be willing to extend his constitutional discussion to a consideration of 10 per cent wine as well?

Mr. DYER. No. I will say to the gentleman that I have reference only to the bill I introduced at the beginning of the session, not wine or beer or anything except to change the alcoholic content.

Mr. CRAMTON. Then I will not press my point.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

Mr. DYER. This deficiency appropriation bill that we are now considering has an item to provide money to enlarge the Coast Guard for the purpose of having the Coast Guard assist in the enforcement of prohibition by preventing rum smugglers reaching the United States. The amount carried in this bill for that purpose is $13,850,622. Ever since the adoption of the prohibition amendment the Congress has been continually called upon to appropriate money in increasing amounts to enforce the law. Notwithstanding it has never failed to give all the money asked for this purpose, it is admitted that to-day the effort to enforce this law is the biggest problem that faces the United States Government. This is so as regards liquor smuggling from outside, as well as the illicit manufacture and sale inside, the United States. The courts, State and Federal, are clogged with these cases. The reason for all this difficulty in enforcing the prohibition law is because it is too drastic. Those who thought that it would be a help for temperance know otherwise now, if they will but see and admit the truth. Real temperance has been put back many years. There is no one denying this fact except the Anti-Saloon League. This organization is continually levying a tribute upon the churches. Of course, the Anti-Saloon League will continue to represent to the churches and the Christian publications that the law is being enforced and that the time will soon come when there will be no such thing as intoxicating liquors in America.

I trust that the Christian people of America, as well as their publications, will investigate this subject themselves and not rely upon the statements coming from the officials of the Anti-Saloon League. I am strongly in favor of temperance. However, I do not believe that real temperance will ever come under the present law. The prohibition enforcement act is too stringent and the American people do not approve of it. The enforcement act ought to be modified so as to permit the manufacture of a light beer. There is no harm in such a product and it would satisfy 65 to 75 per cent of the American people. This large portion of the people would then become aids to enforcing the law, so far as the eighteenth amendment is concerned. The demand for the liquors that are now being smuggled into the United States would be lessened. The expenses for trying to enforce the law would diminish. If a light beer were permitted to be manufactured and sold a tax could be collected from that that would furnish sufficient money to enforce the prohibition law. The American people would thus be relieved of the enormous burdens they now bear in the millions of dollars that are thus annually expended for this purpose. Every time, however, some one suggests this remedy the officials of the Anti-Saloon League, and those they control, cry out that he is trying to destroy the Constitution. They send that statement out to the churches and to its publications, and these people and newspapers, not taking the trouble to investigate the truth, will proclaim the information they get from the Anti-Saloon League. This organization includes me as one of those trying to destroy the Constitution of the United States, because I introduced, on December 5, 1923, a resolution (H. J. Res. 30) to amend the national prohibition act by providing that the alcoholic contents of beverages be changed from not more than one-half of 1 per cent by volume to not more than 2¾ per cent by weight. My resolution does not attack the eighteenth amendment. It only seeks to change the enforcement law so as to comply with the prohibition amendment.

The amendment prohibits the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors, and so forth. I claim, and there is abundant proof, that beverages containing 2¾ per cent alcohol by weight are not intoxicating. This question has been examined very carefully by physicians, scientists, and so forth, and the universal opinion is that this amount of alcohol in beverages is not intoxicating. My resolution simply says that the alcoholic content of beverages may be increased from the present percentage of not more than one-half of 1 per cent to not more than 2¾ per cent. There is no question but what the people want this change made in the present law. I mean by that the great majority of the people. All of the censuses taken by newspapers, organizations, and so forth, have shown this by the preponderance of the votes. Only a few days ago this question was tried out on the radio; and I call attention to a telegram that I received upon the subject, which is as follows:

CHICAGO, ILL., March 10, 1924.

Congressman L. C. DYER,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

Radio vote on modification of Volstead Act taken by Zenith Edgewater Beach Hotel broadcasting station. Biggest telegraphic vote in history. Up to time of sending this telegram there have been counted and sorted 47,190 telegrams. Of these, 33,786 voted for modification; 13,404 voted against modification. Public has spent over $30,000 in telegraphing us. The total vote will go well over 50,000. Telegraph offices all over United States crippled by avalanche of business. Had telegraph companies been able to properly handle the vote it would have gone between seventy-five and one hundred thousand. People stood in line waiting to get into telegraph branch offices to file their telegrams. Telegraph companies advise that this telegraphic response is four times greater than the number of telegrams ever received by any other institution, including White House, Congress, New York Stock Exchange, or political conventions. No one can fairly say this vote was padded by any organized group, because votes at the average cost of 75 cents each would make padding too expensive.

E. F. MCDONALD, JR.,
President National Association of Broadcasters.

I call attention to the affidavits of a number of leading physicians who have made a professional and scientific examination of this question. They all state, under oath, that beverages containing not more than 2¾ per cent alcohol, by weight, are not intoxicating. I do not wish to burden the RECORD with many of these affidavits and only include a few. They are as follows:

Hobart Amory Hare, being duly sworn, deposes and says:

"I. I reside at 1801 Spruce Street, in the city of Philadelphia, State of Pennsylvania.

"II. I am professor of therapeutics, materia medica, and diagnosis in the Jefferson Medical College, Philadelphia, and have been such for the last 28 years. Prior to that time I was demonstrator of experimental therapeutics in the University of Pennsylvania. During the last 28 years I have been visiting physician to the Jefferson Hospital and to other hospitals. I received the degree of doctor of medicine from the Medical School of the University of Pennsylvania in 1884, and bachelor of science in 1885. I am a member of the following societies: American Physiological Society, Association of American Physicians, American Medical Association, and the Pathological Society of Philadelphia.

"III. I am the author of the following works: Text Book of Practical Therapeutics With Special Reference to the Application of Remedial Measures in Disease and Their Employment Upon a Rational Basis, octavo of 1,023 pages, seventeenth edition, published in 1918 by Lea & Febiger, of Philadelphia and New York, which said work has been translated into the Chinese and Korean languages; Diagnosis in the Office and at the Bedside, the Use of Symptoms and Physical Signs in the Diagnosis of Disease, octavo of 548 pages, seventh edition, published in 1914 by Lea & Febiger; Text Book of the Practice of Medicine for Students and Practitioners, octavo of 969 pages, third edition, published in 1915 by Lea & Febiger; National Standard Dispensatory, Containing the Natural History, Chemistry, Pharmacy, Actions, and Uses of Medicines, in conjunction with Charles Caspari, jr., Phar. D., and Henry H. Rusby, M. D., octavo of 2,081 pages, third edition, published in 1916 by Lea & Febiger; and of various essays dealing with the action of drugs upon the human body.

"IV. It is not generally known that there is produced in the human body every day certain quantities of alcohol, not infinitesimal, but in very definite amount, and for this reason alcohol can not be considered a foreign substance, and therefore can be considered as being practically at all times present in the human body. This alcohol is produced principally, if not entirely, by fermentation processes in the intestinal tube; it is absorbed and is contained in the fluids and tissues of the body in general.

"It appears, therefore, that the body is accustomed daily to the utilization or oxidation of a certain percentage of alcohol which is utilized or oxidized in exactly the same manner as alcohol which is produced outside the body and then swallowed in ordinary quantity. For these reasons, alcohol can not be considered as a foreign substance to which the tissues are entirely unaccustomed, and the effects which it produces are governed entirely by the quantity ingested and by the ability of the body to deal with a substance with which it is qualified to deal. If taken in such quantities as to be beyond the power of the body to utilize it or oxidize it, it, like every other substance capable of being swallowed, is capable of producing evil effects. This is true, for example, of water and ordinary table salt. In other words, the question of the power or influence of a given substance introduced into the body is determined by the quantity and concentration of that substance. In general terms, the greater the quantity and the greater the concentration, the greater the effect, and conversely the smaller the quantity and the greater the dilution, the less the effect. Salt, if taken in strong solution, irritates the stomach and causes vomiting, or if not vomited causes such an outpouring of liquid from the tissues of the body into the stomach and intestines as to cause diarrhea. So, too, it is generally known that a considerable quantity of 50 per cent solution of alcohol when taken undiluted may, by its irritant action on the stomach, produce injury, or by its rapid absorption into the blood may produce a condition which is commonly called drunkenness. On the other hand, it is generally recognized that the same quantity of alcohol when diluted with water, so that the alcohol content by per cent is low, is absorbed so slowly as to be deprived of its power or influence in direct ratio with the degree of its dilution. This is due to the fact that the dilution results in a greater volume of fluid having to be absorbed with a consequent slow or delayed entrance of the alcohol into the blood, so that there is at no time a very large quantity in that fluid. During the time of this slow absorption the system is busily engaged in oxidizing or destroying the alcohol as it enters in comparatively small quantities, with the result that the total quantity of alcohol present in the blood at a given moment is comparatively small. In one instance the alcohol may be said to be toxic because it overwhelms the ability of the body to deal with it, just as water may be toxic when taken in such quantity that the body can not deal with it. On the other hand, if alcohol is taken so that the body can deal with and destroy it, minute by minute, there is never a time at which it can act as alcohol and therefore can not exercise any intoxicating properties.

"It follows from the foregoing that if a man drinks a considerable quantity of alcohol of such concentration as to equal 50 per cent, it will enter his blood more rapidly than if it is in dilute form and, therefore, more rapidly than he can deal with it, whereas if he drinks a liquid containing a comparatively small percentage of alcohol, or, in other words, alcohol in a highly diluted form, it may be delivered to those parts of the body which utilize or oxidize the alcohol so slowly that it will never be present in sufficient quantity to produce any of the definite effects caused by alcohol which has escaped oxidation. The rapidity with which an alcoholic fluid is swallowed and the degree of its dilution to a large extent determines its effects, or, in other words, a man in one or two swallows, or one drink, of a 50 per cent solution would take as much alcohol as would a man who ingested about 1 pint of beer. The dilution in the pint of beer results in so slow an absorption of the alcohol content present as to give the body an opportunity to deal with or oxidize it as it is absorbed.

"As illustrative of the delaying effect of dilution upon the absorption of alcohol, attention may be called to the well-known fact that all the strong alcoholic beverages commonly used produce their effect much more mildly if food is taken with them than if they are taken without food.

"These deductions are supported by the following practical observations:

"1. I have in times past taken as much as 1 quart of beer in one hour without any manifestations of intoxication, the said beer containing a higher percentage of alcohol than 2.75 per cent, by weight, although I am not an habitual user of beer of other alcoholic beverages.

"2. I have frequently observed many other persons do likewise.

"3. I have given whisky and brandy containing amounts of alcohol far in excess of the quantity of alcohol contained in 2.75 per cent beer in a quantity that a person can ordinarily drink several times a day without noticing symptoms of intoxication.

"4. A careful study of the report of the Central Control Board of Great Britain (liquor traffic), published in 1918, which board was composed, in part, of men recognized the world over as authorities upon the influence of drugs or medicines upon the living body, confirms the opinions reached by me from personal experience and observation.

"From these personal experiences and observations and considerations of the literature on the subject I am of the opinion that beer containing not to exceed 2.75 per cent of alcohol by weight is not intoxicating under the legal definition of that term.

"II. I am professor of chemistry and toxicology in the medical school of the University of Pennsylvania, in the city of Philadelphia, and have been such for upward of 20 years past, and was dean of the faculty of medicine at the said university from 1892 to 1902. I studied chemistry at Pennsylvania College, Gettysburg, Pa., and medicine at the University of Pennsylvania, from which institution I was graduated with the degree of M. D. In 1878, and thereafter I pursued special studies in chemistry in Europe at the University of Goettingen and at the University of Tuebingen, from which latter institution I was graduated with the degree of Nat. Sc. D.

"III. I am coauthor with G. E. Abbot of a work entitled 'Course for systematic qualitative testing,' and coauthor with Edgar F. Smith of a work entitled 'Chemical analysis of the urine'; and I translated Medicus's Qualitative Analysis, and I have contributed articles to various chemical journals both in this country and abroad.

"IV. I am a member of the following scientific societies: American Chemical Society; American Society of Biological Chemists; American Physiological Society, and American Philosophical Society.

"V. In considering the intoxicating effects of an alcoholic beverage that may be ingested by man we must necessarily consider the effect of the alcohol which by process of absorption passes into the blood. It then becomes important to consider the proportion which said alcohol in the blood bears to the total amount of blood in the body. It is the alcohol in the blood which by direct action on the brain manifests itself in certain disturbances of mental faculties and bodily functions that at a certain point may be regarded as intoxication.

"VI. Accompanying the process of the absorption of the alcohol so ingested from a beverage containing alcohol, there is the constant process of oxidation; that is, destruction of the alcohol in the body, which causes a constant diminution of the total content of the alcohol in the blood. If the process of oxidation of the alcohol in the blood is more rapid than the process of absorption, there never can be any question of intoxication, because there will never be at any one time sufficient alcohol in the blood to produce the effects known as intoxication. It is only when the process of oxidation does not keep pace with the process of absorption of the alcohol in the blood and the process of absorption continues by progressive degrees to exceed the diminution caused by the oxidation of the alcohol in the blood that intoxication can by any possibility result.

"VII. I have considered the published results of experiments that have been conducted by others on the intoxicating effects of alcohol. I likewise have observed to some extent the effects of the drinking of beer. These data have emphasized the fact that low percentages of alcohol in beverages materially reduce and in some instances make the same negligible as intoxicating agents, as alcoholic intoxication is generally understood and construed. In considering whether or not beer containing not to exceed 2.75 per cent by weight of alcohol produces the condition that is ordinarily recognized as intoxication or drunkenness, consideration must be given to the volume and dilution of such beverage ingested and the action of the same upon the process of absorption in the stomach and bowels resulting in the introduction of a given amount of alcohol into the blood. It has been shown that the presence of 0.134 per cent to 0.153 per cent of alcohol in the blood produces the condition generally recognized as intoxication or drunkenness. Based upon the above experiments, the quantity of beer containing 2.75 per cent by weight of alcohol that would be required to be ingested to furnish 0.153 per cent of alcohol in the blood at the time when the maximum quantity of alcohol is present in the blood of a man weighing 69 kilograms, would therefore be 3,185 cubic centimeters, or 3 quarts and 11.7 ounces of the beer, a quantity manifestly beyond the capacity of the human stomach, and a quantity in excess of the amount that is practically drunk by an ordinary man in 30 minutes.

"VIII. One of the experiments resulting in the deductions above referred to was made with wine containing 10.35 per cent by volume of alcohol and obviously the effects observed in that case were more rapid than would be the case in the more diluted beer containing 2.75 per cent by weight of alcohol.

"IX. In view of the foregoing I would not consider that beer with an alcoholic content of 2.75 per cent by weight should be regarded as an intoxicating beverage.

I first served as interne in St. Mary's Hospital, Brooklyn, 1889–90, and in the hospitals of Vienna, Paris, and London in 1890, 1891, 1892. I engaged in general practice in 1890–1893. I was assistant pathologist, Methodist Episcopal Hospital, Brooklyn, for three years, and clinical assistant to the board of health, Brooklyn, and became instructor and later professor of toxicology and pharmacognosy in Columbia University, department of pharmacy, in 1894, and held such position for a period of about 15 years. I was clinical assistant in the department of neurology, Columbia University, for 10 years, from 1900 to about 1910; visiting neurologist in the City Hospital, an institution under the jurisdiction of the department of charities of the city of New York, having about 300 beds, for acute chronic nervous troubles; professor of psychiatry, Fordham University, for about five years, until about 1914; instructor in materia medica, College of Physicians and Surgeons of the city of New York, Columbia University, 1906 to 1910; associate professor of nervous and mental diseases, Post-Graduate Hospital and Medical School, New York City, 1913 to 1918; consulting neurologist, Manhattan State Hospital, Wards Island, for the past 15 years. I have been managing editor of a publication called Journal of Nervous and Mental Diseases since 1900. I am a member of the following scientific societies: American Neurological Association, a national society of specialists in neurology; American Medical Psychological Association, a national society of specialists in psychiatry; American Psycho-Pathological Society, a society of specialists in psychopathology (president of this society in 1917–18); American Psycho-Analytic Society; New York Neurological Society (president 1912 and 1913); New York Psychiatric Society, and member of local, State, and national general medical societies, including the New York Academy of Medicine. After graduation I spent approximately five years in post-graduate study in clinics and hospitals of France, Germany, Italy, England, and the United States, in the study of nervous and mental diseases at intervals of from three months to two years continuous residence. I was editor of the Medical News, a weekly medical journal from 1903 to 1908; associate editor of the New York Medical Journal 1908 to 1910 and 1917 to 1919; associate editor of the Psycho-Analytic Review and associate editor Nervous and Mental Monograph Series, a series of monographs devoted to diseases of the nervous system, 30 of which monographs have been issued since 1909; and author of 100 short articles on subjects devoted to the specialties mentioned. I have translated 8 to 10 works from the French, German, and Italian into English on nervous and mental diseases. I am coauthor and editor with Dr. William A. White, of Washington, D. C., of Modern Treatment of Nervous and Mental Diseases, octavo, 2 volumes, 1,600 pages, Lea & Febiger, of New York and Philadelphia, publisher, and coauthor with Dr. William A. White of Diseases of the Nervous System, octavo, 1 volume, 1,000 pages, 2 editions, Lea & Febiger, publisher, New York and Philadelphia.

"III. I first became interested in the action of alcohol while I was an instructor at Columbia University. I made special experimental studies for four or five years, psychological investigations, as well with students and animals, and made a number of extensive experimental studies with animals and men on changes in the nervous tissues due to acute and chronic poisoning, alcoholic and otherwise, some of the results of which have been incorporated in some of the articles referred to, especially studies on multiple neuritis and Korsakow psychosis, and the mentality of the alcoholic, morphine, heroin, alcohol, and other drug addicts. In addition I have seen thousands of acute and chronic alcoholic cases in the wards of the City Hospital, Bellevue, Bloomingdale Hospital, the Government Hospital for the Insane, Binghamton State Hospital, Hospital of La Salpetriere in Paris, and the Charity Hospital in Berlin, and to a great extent I have made psychological investigation in private practice of patients addicted to the various grades of alcoholism.

"IV. Practically all of the older data relative to the subject of alcoholism and the taking of beer or light wines pertain to solutions of from 4 to 12 per cent of alcohol, and there are practically no available data that can be said to be scientific or medically reliable on beers containing less than 4 or 5 per cent of alcohol by weight.

"V. A very wide investigation of the literature of the subject reveals that nearly all of the statistics concerning beer drinking dealt with beers of from 6 to 10 per cent in strength. The extensive psychological and neuro-muscular experiments of Kraepelin were conducted on beers and alcoholic beverages of far greater alcoholic strength than 2.75 per cent by weight. In some of these cases the alcohol percentage was not stated and the results of these experiments are thereby entirely vitiated.

"VI. From my personal experience and investigation and from observations made upon others, as well as from my study of the experiences, investigations, and experiments recorded by others in the scientific literature of many countries, I am of the opinion that beer or any beverage which contains not to exceed 2.75 per cent of alcohol by weight, when consumed by an ordinary man or woman, in such quantities as the human stomach can ordinarily hold, is not intoxicating.

"I have been secretary of the faculty of the School of Medicine of Columbia University since 1905, and a scientific director of the New York Botanical Garden since 1910.

"IV. I have had general experience in biological chemistry and have done original work in that field. I have been an investigator, since 1895, of the effects of foods, poisons, and other substances, including alcohol, on the bodies of plants, animals, and human beings. I have conducted many analyses of the parts of plants, animals, and human beings for the identification in them of normal and abnormal substances, including alcohol. I have published many papers on the results of my investigations since 1896 in leading American journals devoted to original research. I am at the present managing editor of two research journals, namely, the Biochemical Bulletin and the Journal of Dental Research; also editor of the Biological Department of Chemical Abstracts.

"V. It is well known that the main effect of alcohol on the human body is the effect that is registered on the brain and nervous system in general, and that the action is narcotic in character. Scientific knowledge on the mode of action of alcohol is summed up in the following conclusions in the report of the advisory committee to the British Central Control Board (Liquor Traffic), as stated on pages IX and 125 of the printed copy (1917):

"'Apart from the results of its continued excessive use, the main effects of alcohol that have any real significance are due to its action on the nervous system. * * * The result of scientific research concerning the action of alcohol on the respiration, the circulation, the digestion, the muscular system, is to show that, as far as direct action is concerned, alcohol, when administered in moderate doses, in dilute form and at sufficient intervals, has no effect of any serious and practical account. A further conclusion of capital importance which emerges with equal clearness is that the action of alcohol on the nervous system is essentially sedative, and * * * is not truly stimulant.'

"VI. After ingested alcohol passes from the stomach, through the walls of the stomach or intestines, or both, into the blood, it is distributed in the blood to all parts of the body, where a large proportion of the alcohol is consumed by the familiar process of oxidation. In this process of consumption, the affected alcohol entirely disappears. The effect that alcohol produces on the nervous system is the effect, in the main, that is induced by that portion of the circulated alcohol that is not yet thus oxidized or eliminated. The alcohol that is oxidized yields to the body, in this process, its full equivalent of heat energy. This fact explains why alcohol is, to this extent, regarded as a food. The amount of alcohol circulating in the blood of a human being that experiment has shown is required to induce mild intoxication, is an amount that is somewhat above 0.1 per cent of the blood in such subject.

"VII. Considering the fact well established that the amount of alcohol necessarily present in the blood to induce intoxication must be above one-tenth of 1 per cent (0.1), the question arises whether the accumulation of this minimum proportion is affected by any of the qualities of such a beverage as beer. It is obvious, of course, that the smaller the proportion of alcohol in the beer the greater must be the volume of the beverage taken in order to present a quantity of alcohol that would yield in the blood this minimum proportion. But the greater the volume of beer taken into the stomach the sooner the sense of satiety is attained and the weaker becomes the inclination to take a quantity of this beverage sufficient to yield this minimum proportion of alcohol to the blood.

"VIII. It is obvious, of course, that, when an alcoholic beverage is taken into a stomach that already contains food, or when such a beverage is taken into a stomach with food, the quantity of the beverage that can be ingested as a maximum is thus automatically reduced and the proportion of alcohol in the mixture in the stomach is correspondingly less than that in the beverage itself, so that the larger the quantity of food to be digested with an alcoholic beverage, all other things being equal, the smaller the maximum proportion of alcohol to be registered in the blood.

"On these matters the advisory committee of the British Central Board (Liquor Traffic) has reported (1917) as follows (p. 90):

"'As our practical conclusion, then, from the evidence at present available, we may say that any form of alcoholic liquor can cause drunkenness, if such a quantity of it is taken, at once or within a short time, as will lead to the presence of the drug in the blood above a certain proportion, which in the case of the average healthy adult may be put provisionally at from 0.15 to 0.2 per cent. From the point of view of the prevention of drunkenness, the superiority of the more dilute beverages, such as the lighter beers and natural wines, is therefore mainly due to the fact that the bulk of the fluid makes it difficult for the drinker to consume a very large dose of alcohol within a moderate period.'

"IX. Dilution (low percentage) of alcohol in the beverage, and diminution in the volume of the beverage in the stomach (by admixture with food), are mechanical factors that keep down the proportion of alcohol in the blood of the individual involved, and may wholly prevent the alcohol in the beverage from rising to an inebriating proportion in the blood. Beer also tends to retard somewhat the passage of the contents of the stomach into the intestine, by diminishing the number and force of the ordinary muscular movements of the stomach, thus slowing up also the general absorption of the contained alcohol. The contained food matter in beer has likewise a retarding action, indirectly at least, on the passage of the mixture into the intestine from the stomach and on the passage of the alcohol into the blood.

"X. Any influence, such as those mentioned above, that involves a lowered proportion of alcohol in the beverage taken, diminution in the volume of the beverage ingested, or delay in the transmission of the alcohol in the beverage from the stomach into the intestine reduces the amount that represents the maximum accumulation (proportion) of alcohol in the blood, in a particular individual under given circumstances, because the total quantity of alcohol that passes into the blood enters it more slowly, is relatively less in amount, and the oxidative processes for the physiological disposition of the alcohol that enters the blood and thence the tissues are correspondingly more completely and promptly effective.

"I have been asked for an opinion as to whether beer containing 2.75 per cent, by weight, is capable of causing intoxication. As intoxication or drunkenness is commonly understood and legally defined, I am of the opinion that beer with an alcohol content not to exceed 2.75 per cent, by weight, is not capable of causing intoxication and should not be considered an intoxicating beverage.

"My opinion is based on the following facts:

"I have frequently seen men take as much as 1 quart of beer within one hour without any manifestations of intoxication, said beer containing a higher percentage of alcohol than 2.75 per cent, by weight.

"As to the evidence of laboratory investigation: This evidence is too abundant to be quoted in its entirety, but the following facts are to the point:

"In November, 1916, the Central Control Board of Great Britain (Liquor Traffic) appointed an advisory committee to consider, among other things, the physiological effect of alcohol. That committee was composed of eminent scientific men.

"The committee prepared, 'as a provisional basis for further research,' a review of 'the existing state of scientific knowledge regarding the action of alcohol on the human organism. The conclusions represent the unanimous judgment of the committee.'

"According to the findings of this committee of the central control board, definite intoxication in man does not occur until the concentration of alcohol in the circulating blood of the body rises above one-tenth of 1 per cent, and fifteen-hundredths of 1 per cent of alcohol in the blood caused mild intoxication. The dose of alcohol required to yield this proportion of alcohol in the blood—one-tenth of 1 per cent—is approximately 1 part of alcohol per 1,000 of body weight. If a man weighing 70 kilograms takes alcohol to the amount of 1 to 1,000 of his weight, he will take 1 gram per kilo, or 70 grams.

"If such a man takes 2½ liters of beer having an alcoholic content of 2.75 per cent, by weight, he will take 68.75 grams of alcohol, and at its highest point of concentration he will have an amount of alcohol in his blood that bears the ratio to the total blood content of his body of about 1 to 1,000. The amount of blood in such a person's body is, according to Haldane, about 3,500 grams, so that he would have about 3.5 grams of alcohol in his blood at the highest point of concentration. As a matter of fact, our man, weighing 70 kilos, under the conditions specified, would have this proportion of alcohol—one-tenth of 1 per cent—in his blood only for a very short period, and would have to take 3¾ liters of such 2.75 per cent beer practically at one time to get fifteen-hundredths of 1 per cent of alcohol into his blood. This would be approximately a gallon of such beer, a quantity far in excess of the capacity of the stomach.

"Chittenden and Mendel state that if 6 to 8 cubic centimeters of alcohol are swallowed in beer, it takes one-half hour for 80 to 90 per cent of the alcohol to be absorbed. Assuming that the rate of absorption of the alcohol is constant, then if it takes one-half hour to absorb 6 to 8 cubic centimeters in beer, it will take approximately four times as long, or two hours, to absorb the 34.3 cubic centimeters in 1 liter of such 2.75 per cent beer.

"In discussing the question of the quantity of absolute alcohol that can be completely oxidized in the body, so that there will be none remaining to exercise injurious influences upon the tissues, Hutchison, in his work entitled 'Food and the Principles of Dietetics,' states (p. 348) that '1 to 1½ fluid ounces'—that is, 29.6 to 44.4 cubic centimeters—'is about the amount that can be completely oxidized in the body in one day, and in such a way that none of its paralyzing or narcotic effects are manifested and none appears in the urine,' and further observes that this is equivalent to at least 20 ounces of 5 per cent beer. This would mean that the body could completely oxidize or destroy the total alcoholic content of about 1.1 liters (of the beer with alcoholic content of 2.75 per cent by weight).

"As a matter of fact, it is more than 1.1 liters, because 20 ounces imperial measure, which Hutchinson uses, is 1 imperial pint, and 1 imperial pint is equivalent to 19.2 fluid ounces in wine measure, the wine pint being 16 fluid ounces.

"To quote Hutchison again (p. 349):

"'A factor which must influence any calculation as to the amount of alcohol which can safely be consumed daily is the form and mode in which the alcohol is taken. It will be generally conceded that the same quantity of alcohol is less likely to be injurious if taken in a dilute than in a concentrated form. It must be evident also that an amount of alcohol which would be harmful if swallowed at one time may be free from risk if spread evenly over the day. The danger to be avoided is flooding the circulation at one time with an amount which it is beyond the power of the cells to oxidize.'

"The above-mentioned report (p. 88) puts mild intoxication at 8½ ounces of absolute alcohol or more than 4 pints of beer of average strength containing 4 per cent of alcohol for a man weighing 140 pounds.

"All this does not allow, however, for slowness of absorption due to dilution.

"To quote the British control board again (pp. 90–91):

"'The superiority of the more dilute beverages, such as the lighter beers and natural wines, is therefore mainly due to the fact that the bulk of the fluid makes it difficult for the drinker to consume a very large dose of alcohol within a moderate period.'

"And again, on page 131 of the report:

"'We deal here solely with the physiological aspect of the alcohol question, and our consideration of this aspect leads us to recognize that the agreeable effects which the majority of people experience from the use of alcoholic beverages can be produced by doses of alcohol moderate in quantity and taken in adequate dilution and at sufficient intervals, which will not in normally constituted persons be attended with appreciable risk to physical or mental health.'

"And again on page 133:

"'The temperate consumption of alcoholic liquors in accordance with these rules of practice may be considered to be physiologically harmless in the case of the large majority of normal adults; and this conclusion, it may be added, is fully borne out by the massive experience of mankind in wine-drinking and beer-drinking countries.'

"As the capacity of the human stomach of an adult even when moderately distended ranges from three to five pints, it is manifest that an intoxicating quantity of 2.75 per cent beer could not be taken under ordinary conditions, especially with food accompanying it or already in the stomach.

"I am therefore of the opinion that the beer of alcoholic content of 2.75 per cent by weight is not an intoxicating bevera

Appleton & Co., 1912.

"IV. Alcoholism has been a subject of deep interest to me, and I feel that I know well the status of our information as to the action of alcohol upon the human body, both in its physical and psychical manifestations. I have been impressed with the theory which has been advanced by some authorities, that alcohol is produced within our bodies, as referred to by H. C. Woods, in his Therapeutics, 1901, pp. 284-290, as follows:

"'As Lieben also found that this substance exists in the urine of dogs, horses, and lions, and as A. Rajewski obtained it from healthy rabbits, it must be acknowledged that our present knowledge strongly indicates that alcohol is formed and exists in the normal organism.'

"This, in my opinion, explains the well-known fact that the human body tolerates alcohol well, and that while almost every adult takes alcohol in some form or other, comparatively few persons are adversely affected by it, and then only when it is used excessively and in highly concentrated form. It seems to me that this is accounted for by the fact that the power to rapidly burn up or oxidize alcohol is possessed to a remarkable degree by the cells of the body. As an earnest advocate of temperance, I have watched with great interest how the drinking of whisky has given place to the drinking of beer, and I attribute the well-known fact that alcoholism is a disappearing disease largely to this cause.

"V. I have personal experience with the 'war beer' now being sold and which I am told contains 2¾ (2.75) per cent of alcohol by weight, and I have noted its mildness, and though I rarely use alcoholic beverages personally, and am very susceptible to the action of alcohol, I have felt scarcely any effect from this beer other than that of a refreshing beverage. From my personal experience, and as a physician, I do not consider beer containing 2¾ (2.75) per cent by weight of alcohol an intoxicating beverage.

"JAMES J. WALSH, M. D."

George W. King, being duly sworn, deposes and says as follows:

"I. I am a practicing physician and reside in Jersey City, State of New Jersey. I was graduated from the medical school of the University of Michigan, in 1879, with the degree of doctor of medicine and was duly admitted to practice medicine in the State of New Jersey in the year 1880, and have since that time continued to be a duly licensed practitioner of medicine in that State.

"I took post-graduate course in New York University, and in June, 1881, I was appointed medical director of the Hudson County Hospital for Insane at Secaucus, N. J., and continued in that position until March, 1912, at which time I was made county physician of Hudson County, N. J. As medical director of the said hospital I devoted myself mainly to the study and treatment of nervous and mental diseases.

"II. As medical director of said hospital for the insane I had extensive experience in the study and treatment of the effects of the excessive use of alcohol upon the nervous and mental functions. It was the common practice in that community to send patients who were suffering from the effects of excessive indulgence in alcohol resulting in the derangement or impairment of such functions to the hospital for treatment.

"III. I was county physician from March, 1912, to December, 1916, and in that capacity I was required to examine persons who were committed to the county jail of Hudson County suffering from any form of mental or alcoholic disturbance for the purpose of having their mental status inquired into. In this capacity and during this time I observed a large number of cases of persons who suffered from excessive indulgence in alcohol. In December, 1916, I was again appointed medical director of the Hudson County Hospital for the Insane, which position I have continuously held since then.

"IV. During the long experience that I have had in the capacities mentioned above and in the treatment and care of persons suffering from alcoholic indulgence I have never known of a single case of alcoholism resulting from the drinking of beer, and this is true when the alcoholic content of beer was upward of 4 per cent by weight.

"In the treatment of alcoholism I have always considered both the kind and quantity of alcoholic liquor that a given subject had been indulging in, and in the study of the history of such cases and from my experience I have learned that material disturbance of mental functions or intoxication does not normally result from indulgence in beer drinking.

"V. A beer containing an alcoholic content of not to exceed 2.75 per cent by weight is a beverage of much lower alcoholic content than a beer that has been dispensed heretofore, and such beer, in my opinion, is not intoxicating.

"GEORGE W. KING."

Arthur Perry Hasking, being duly sworn, deposes and says, as follows:

"I. I am a practicing physician and reside at 318 Montgomery Street, Jersey City, Hudson County, N. J. I was graduated from the College of Physicians and Surgeons in the city of New York, the Medical School of Columbia University in 1903.

"I served as interne in 1903 and 1904 at the Jersey City Hospital, Jersey City, N. J., and was pathologist at St. Francis Hospital, Jersey City, N. J., from 1904 to 1910. In 1906 I became assistant attending surgeon at that hospital until 1912, when I was made attending neurologist and psychiatrist, a position I still hold. I have been neurologist and psychiatrist at the Jersey City Hospital since 1915, when that department was created. I have been attending neurologist and psychiatrist at Christ Hospital since 1917, and at the Greenville Hospital since 1917, both of which hospitals are in Jersey City, N. J., and at North Hudson Hospital, Weehawken, N. J., since the beginning of 1919, all of which positions I now hold.

"II. In 1910 I was appointed assistant to the county physician of Hudson County, in the State of New Jersey. I had previously been associated pathologically with the office of county physician in an unofficial capacity since 1902, and I have performed practically all the post mortem examinations which came to the office of the county physician since 1902. Since I have been practicing medicine I have personally performed upward of 2,800 autopsies.

"I am a member of the American Medical Association, the Medical Society of New Jersey, the Hudson County Medical Society, the Physicians and Surgeons Club of Jersey City, N. J., the Aesculapian Club of Jersey City, N. J., the Academy of Medicine of the State of New Jersey, the Essex County Pathological Society, the American Medico-Psychological Association, and the Society of Military Surgeons of the United States.

"III. As assistant to the county physician of Hudson County, N. J., the duties I was called upon to perform and did perform included, among other things, (1) the examination and commitment of insane persons, (2) examination for the advice of the court of all persons who were insane or alleged to be insane, and (3) medical treatment of all prisoners and witnesses in the county jail. The persons who are confined in the county jail are all persons awaiting trial or action by the grand jury and all persons sentenced by police magistrates for short terms of 90 days or less. In Hudson County a large proportion of cases of delirium tremens are sent to the county jail for treatment.

"Since my graduation from medical school my work has been in hospitals where alcoholism has been a continual factor, and my work in the main has been the care of these cases. The Jersey City Hospital is the only hospital in Jersey City which makes special provisions for the care of cases of alcoholism, and consequently nearly all cases of alcoholism in the city hospital requiring care have been treated in the alcoholic ward of this hospital, in which I had served as an interne, and of which, since my appointment to the attending staff, I have had full charge. Many thousands of cases of alcoholism have passed through my hands, and my work as assistant to the county physician has involved the examination and treatment of persons convicted of intoxication and other forms of disorderly conduct. As part of the diagnosis of patients I questioned them, and both from their statements and from my observation and experience of the beer which is being brewed and sold at the present time, which, I am informed and truly believe, contains 2¾ per cent alcohol by weight, I have studied the effects of such beer. The patients themselves refer to the modern beer as 'crippled beer' because it has no 'kick.' From my study, investigation, and experience as a physician, and especially in the treatment of cases having to do with intoxication or alcoholism in various forms, I am of the opinion that the beer which is at present brewed and which, I am informed and verily believe, contains only 2¾ per cent alcohol by weight, is not intoxicating.

"ARTHUR PERRY HASKINS."

Moses Keschner, being duly sworn, deposes and says, as follows:

"1. I am a practicing physician and reside at No. 264 Seventh Street, in the Borough of Manhattan, city and State of New York.

"I graduated from the College of Physicians and Surgeons in the city of New York, in the class of 1899, and for one year after graduating served as interne at the hospitals of the health department of the city of New York. In 1901 I began the private practice of medicine, which I have continued to this date. In 1909 I was graduated from the New York Law School and admitted to the bar of New York State in 1910, and have made a study of medical jurisprudence. Since January of 1906 I have been at different times visiting physician to the institutions of the department of correction of the city of New York. I was at the Kings County Penitentiary for over one year, New York County Penitentiary for one year, Queens County City Prison and the Manhattan City Prison at frequent intervals, and the remainder of the time and at present at the city prison in Brooklyn, N. Y. During 1914 I was attending neurologist to Beth Israel Hospital, O. P. D. Since February, 1915, I have been adjunct attending neurologist to Montefiore Home and Hospital, New York, and since June, 1915, I have been adjunct attending neurologist to Central Neurological Hospital on Blackwells Island, an institution under the department of public charities of the city of New York.

"I am a fellow of the American Medical Association, a member of the Medical Society of the State of New York, Medical Society of the County of New York, Eastern Medical Society, New York Neurological Society, and Yorkville Medical Society. I am also one of the contributing editors on neurology to Tice's Practice of Medicine.

"2. In the city prison in Brooklyn I see about 2,000 patients a year suffering from some phase of alcoholism. It has been part of my duty to treat these cases, and as part of my diagnosis I have to ask and ascertain what the patient has been drinking. Since the advent of the beer which is now made and which contains, as I am informed and verily believe, 2.75 per cent of alcohol by weight, I have not found a single case of intoxication from such beer. From my study, investigation, and professional experience I am of the opinion that this beer is not intoxicating.

"MOSES KESCHNER."

George Elliot Flint, being duly sworn, deposes and says:

"1. I reside at No. 80 West One hundred and sixty-ninth Street, in the Borough of Manhattan, city of New York, and am 48 years of age.

"2. I am a graduate of the Woodbridge School of the city of New York, and spent two years in professional study in the school of mines of Columbia University.

"III. From the time I was about 17 years of age I became intensely interested in physical development and made from that time on a special study of that subject. I found from my experience in developing my own body, which at that time was not highly developed, that there are certain fundamental principles governing physical development which must be observed in order that a man should advance in physical well-being. It became apparent to me, from the observations of my own case as well as from the observation of many others that came to my attention during the long period in which I was engaged in the physical training of men, that physical development could be brought about and greatly aided by indulging in periods of intensive and progressive physical activity relieved by periods of rest, giving the body opportunity to recuperate and relax, and that relaxation was quite as important in physical development as is intensive physical activity.

"IV. I observed in this connection that there are classes of persons who are able by the exercise of volition alone to relax from intensive training at various periods in order to get the physical rest that is so requisite in my plan for proper physical improvement; whereas in other cases I found that the mental attitude of the subject is such that he seems unable to exercise such volition to relax and rest, and that it is necessary in such cases to provide some means by which such rest and relaxation can be induced. From my own experience I found that this rest and relaxation, so requisite to proper physical development, were aided by a moderate indulgence in the drinking of ale. I found in the cases of other subjects that came to my attention that beer would exercise the same function and accomplish the same results. I found that athletes, particularly after the age of 30 years, would go "stale," or, in other words, become overtrained by reason of the fact that they would not or did not sufficiently relax and rest between the periods of intensive training; that this was also due to the fact that such men after intensive training would because of their mature vigor feel that they were able to continue with intensity their physical training, unmindful of the fact that proper periods of rest and relaxation were as important to their ultimate physical development as were their periods of intensive training. In such instances it appeared that the will outdistanced the purely physical functions and overtaxed the physical functions without consciousness on the part of the subject that such operation was going on, with the ultimate result that athletes of this type find that at about middle age the peak of their physical and athletic activity has been reached, and that they are from that time declining in physical strength. This condition is not in accordance with the natural development of the human body and is not a necessary accompaniment or result of intensive physical training. In such cases, had the subjects indulged during the period of their training in sufficient periods of rest and relaxation, they would have found that they would have continued during many years to gain in strength and endurance. I have been convinced of the truth of this statement through my personal dealings with many subjects and have put this theory into practice during a period of many years with great benefit to those who have followed it.

"V. I found in many subjects who did not readily respond to my suggestion for alternating periods of intensive physical training with periods of relaxation that it was necessary and very helpful to have such subjects indulge in a moderate use of beer, ale, or other alcoholic beverages, avoiding always, of course, any excess, as excess in all things is injurious.

"This principle was applied particularly in the case of those who had an insufficient amount of tissue to resist the oxidation processes that go on with any intensive physical activity; in other words, the principle is particularly applicable to persons who are materially underweight for their height and age. As a result, I found that my system of physical training, carried out in this manner, resulted in bringing up those who were materially underweight and who, by reason thereof, were susceptible to diseases that readily attack those who are undernourished and who apparently do not assimilate adequately their food, and that it reduced those who were materially overweight.

"VI. I embodied some observations from my experience in a volume entitled 'Power and Health Through Progressive Exercise,' which was published in 1905 by Baker & Taylor, New York. The introduction to that book was written by my father, the late Austin Flint, M. D., in which introduction he approved the principles I had expressed.

"VII. By reason of my great interest in physical development and the human body I have been keen to observe the evidence of alcohol upon the human system when used either in its concentrated form, as in whisky, brandy, cordials, or the like, and in the more diluted forms of light wines, ales, and beers. I have particularly observed that while the habitual use in excess of liquors with high alcoholic content occasionally produced the alcohol habit or chronic inebriety, that effect was never produced by the lighter alcoholic drinks, such as the light wines, ales, and beers. It is well known that a large proportion of the population moderately indulge in the lighter alcoholic beverages containing not more than 8 or 10 per cent of alcohol, yet that few become, through that indulgence, addicted to the use of alcohol in such manner as to produce inebriety or drunkenness. If such indulgence in light alcoholic beverages were conducive to the forming of the alcohol habit, such persons naturally would in time indulge in the use of the more concentrated alcoholic beverages, such as brandy, whisky, and cordials, to an excessive degree, and that would develop in due time a large number of drunkards. As a matter of fact, that result has never been observed in human experience, but, on the contrary, drunkenness has steadily decreased in nearly all countries of the world.

"VIII. I have embodied in my recent work, 'The Whole Truth About Alcohol' (the Macmillan Co., of New York, 1919), my firm conviction that beer is not a strong stimulant, is not destructive nor habit forming, nor injurious, but is wholesome, tonic, and strenghtening. Also that there are no beer drunkards. I am convinced that the irreclaimable sots who assert that they drink only beer are, in fact, not truthful, but that they drink, in addition, other more concentrated solutions of alcoholic beverages.

"IX. I am convinced that should people be deprived of the benefits arising from the comfort and relaxation induced by proper indulgence in beverages of low alcoholic content they will seek pernicious and destructive substitutes in the form of narcotic drugs, and that the error of the prohibition of such beverages of low alcoholic content will be realized when it will be too late to save from the slavery of such narcotic drugs thousands who would not have attempted their use. I am convinced of the wisdom and the necessity of permitting the manufacture and use of beer as a beverage, and particularly such beer as is now brewed, which, as I am informed and verily believe, contains an alcoholic content of 2.75 per cent by weight, and further, I am of the opinion that such beer is not intoxicating.

"GEORGE ELLIOT FLINT."

Charles A. Rosewater, being duly sworn, deposes and says:

"I am a practitioner of medicine, duly licensed to practice in the States of New York and New Jersey, and I reside at 47 South Street, Newark, N. J.

"II. I was graduated from the College of Physicians and Surgeons in the city of New York with the degree of M. D. in 1899. For one year following graduation I served upon the house staff of the Mount Sinai Hospital, New York, following which I spent about one year in post-graduate studies in Europe.

"For several years I served on the medical staffs of the Mount Sinai Hospital Dispensary, in New York City, and I have at various times been connected in a professional capacity with the St. James Hospital, Newark, N. J., and the Newark City Dispensary.

"I am a member of the following scientific societies: The Academy of Medicine of Northern New Jersey, American Medical Asociation, Essex County Medical Society, Medical Society of New Jersey, and American Society for the Study of Alcohol and Narcotics.

"By appointment of Gov. John Franklin Fort, of New Jersey, I served as vice president of the Dependency and Crime Commission of New Jersey, in which capacity I made a study of crime and poverty, with special reference to the relations of alcohol and drug using thereto.

"At the instance of the State Board of Health of Louisiana I drafted the present narcotic law of that State. I also made investigations with reference to the use of narcotics for the Governor of West Virginia, the State Board of Health of Georgia, the State Board of Health of Virginia, and the Food and Drug Commission of Tennessee.

"For the past 14 years practically all my professional activities have been devoted to the study and treatment of persons addicted to the use of alcohol and narcotic drugs.

"I have published in leading medical periodicals monographs upon the subject of inebriety, some of which are the following: 'Apomorphine in acute alcoholism,' 'The drink habit and its treatment,' 'What can we do for and with the inebriate?' 'A plea for the establishment of hospitals for the rational treatment of inebriates,' 'The obliteration of the craving for narcotics,' 'Some suggestions for the solution of the liquor problem,' and 'Report of a case of Korsakow's psychosis.'

"I was chairman of the mayor's committee for the investigation of the narcotic and habit-forming drugs of Newark, N. J., in 1918, and was organizer and chief of the narcotic clinic for the study and treatment of drug addicts of Newark, N. J.

"III. During the greater part of the year 1918, for the purpose of gathering material for a book upon inebriety I am now writing, I made a survey throughout various parts of this country of the extent and effects of the use of alcohol and narcotic drugs. During the course of my investigations I studied conditions existing in the neighborhood of 14 United States Army camps and cantonments, and became informed as to drinking customs among our soldiers and the effects upon them of various alcoholic beverages.

"IV. I have recently been honorably discharged from the United States Army, in which I served as a captain of the Medical Corps, being attached to the neuropsychiatrical service. In this capacity I came into contact with large numbers of soldiers and had the opportunity of making inquiries into the drinking customs of our soldiers in France and the effects of mild alcoholic beverages upon the health and morale of our Army.

"I have studied the subject of drunkenness with Abraham A. Brill, M. D., of New York, author and teacher; George E. Pettey, M. D., of Memphis, Tenn., author of 'The Narcotic Drug Diseases and Allied Ailment'; and L. V. Guthrie, M. D., medical superintendent of the Huntington (W. Va.) State hospital for the insane.

"V. I have studied the literature upon the subject of alcohol and have consulted the writings of about 75 medical authorities and have read numerous monographs upon the subject. I have read the book entitled 'The Whole Truth About Alcohol,' written by George Elliot Flint, published in 1919, the correctness of which is vouched for by Dr. Abraham Jacobi, the nestor of American medicine, who wrote the introduction to the said book and indorsed the author's statements of fact as scientific and his conclusions as sound. Flint says, 'There are no beer drunkards' (p. 15), and:

"'* * * In all my experience I can affirm that I have never seen an habitual drunkard or even a steady "tippler" who did not indulge mostly in strong drink, usually whisky. * * * Some irreclaimable "sots" assert that they drink "only beer," but careful watching will prove that they do not tell the truth' (p. 38). * * * 'I repeat that never does beer, ale, or any of the lighter wines make a drunkard' (p. 47).

"I have read the recently published book entitled 'Alcohol, Its Action on the Human Organism,' containing the report of the advisory committee of the Central Control Board (Liquor Traffic) of Great Britain, said advisory committee consisting of the following authorities:

"Lord D'Abernon, G. C. M. G. (chairman), chairman of the Central Control Board (Liquor Traffic).

"Sir George Newman, K. C. B., M. D. (vice chairman), principal medical officer to the board of education, member of the Central Control Board (Liquor Traffic).

"Prof. A. R. Cushny, M. D., F. R. S., professor of pharmacology at University College, London.

"H. H. Dale, M. D., F. R. S., head of the department of biochemistry and pharmacology under the medical research committee, National Health Insurance.

"M. Greenwood, M. R. C. S., statistician to the Lister Institute of Preventive Medicine and reader in medical statistics in the University of London.

"W. McDougall, M. R., F. R. S., reader in mental philosophy at the University of Oxford and fellow of Corpus Christi College, Oxford.

"F. W. Mott, M. D., F. R. S., pathologist to the London County Asylums, consulting physician to Charing Cross Hospital.

"Prof. C. S. Sherrington, M. D., F. R. S., Waymflete professor of physiology in the University of Oxford and fellow of Magdalene College, Oxford.

"W. C. Sullivan, M. D., medical superintendent of the Rampton State Asylum for Criminal Lunatics.

"I have noted in said report of the above-mentioned committee certain conclusions having an important bearing on the question as to whether beer with an alcoholic content of 2.75 per cent is intoxicating. I quote from same as follows:

"Page 18: 'The absorption of alcohol is therefore complete and in comparison with that of foodstuffs needing preliminary digestion, such as meat, it is conspicuously rapid. The actual speed absorption seems to vary with a number of conditions, such as the form in which the alcohol is taken, extent to which it is diluted, and the time in relation to meals.'

"Page 20: 'In from 15 to 24 hours after a dose of alcohol has been taken the whole of it has disappeared completely. The destruction of the alcohol, indeed, begins as soon as it reaches the blood. * * * In this way it has been found that for the first few hours the alcohol is passing into the blood more rapidly than it is destroyed. * * * After an interval, varying with the dose among other conditions, the concentration reaches a maximum and usually remains at about that level for some time. This maintenance of level concentration does not mean that the absorption has been completed, but that it has been overtaken by the destruction and that for the time being the two processes practically balance one another. Then the rate at which alcohol disappears becomes greater than that at which it is entering the circulation, so that the concentration in the blood declines until after about 24 hours no more alcohol can be discovered anywhere in the body.'

"Page 21: 'There being no evidence of its change into some other substance which the body can retain, the supposition is natural that it is completely "oxidized" or burnt, producing, as when burnt in air, carbon dioxide and water, which pass out in the breath and urine.'

"Page 24: 'There can be no doubt, therefore, that alcohol is a "food" in the sense of fuel that the body can use. We have seen that alcohol is not stored by the body.'

"Page 33: 'The successive stages or phases of intoxication can not be sharply distinguished and every case presents its peculiar combination and succession of features, varying with the temperament and disposition and character of the individual and his circumstances of the moment.'

"Page 61: 'Excessive doses of alcohol are liable to cause vomiting.'

"Page 85: 'In reference to alcohol, then, it will be sufficient if, without trying to be too precise, we take it that a drinker really begins to suffer from acute poisoning as soon as he shows such immediate effects of the drug as interfere with his normal capacity for taking care of himself.'

"Page 87: 'Similarly in cases of drunkenness in man, the blood has been found to contain in one observation 0.153 per cent of alcohol and in another instance when the intoxication was more pronounced, 0.227 per cent.'

"Page 88: 'The amount present in the blood soon reaches a maximum level bearing a pretty constant relation to the dose originally drunk. So that, knowing the quantity of absolute alcohol taken and the body weight of the drinker, we can at once give an approximate estimate of the maximum proportion of the drug which will be found in the circulation; and, conversely, we can say what amount of alcohol must be administered to give any particular percentage in the blood. Thus, taking the figures which we have quoted, the proportion of the 1.5 which was found in the blood in the less pronounced case of intoxication would correspond to an original dose of 1.5 cubic centimeters of absolute alcohol for each kilogram of body weight, and this amount, expressed in English measure, would be roughly equivalent, in the case of a man weighing 10 stone to a total dose of three and one-half ounces of absolute alcohol.' (Note.—Three and one-half ounces of absolute alcohol is the amount contained in about one gallon of 2.75 beer.)

"Page 90: 'As our practical conclusion, then, from the evidence at present available, we may say that any form of alcoholic liquor can cause drunkenness, if a sufficient quantity of it is taken, at once or within a short time, as will lead to the presence of the drug in the blood, above a certain proportion which in the case of the average healthy adult, may be put provisionally of from the 0.15 to 0.2 per cent. From the point of view of the prevention of drunkenness, the superiority of the more dilute beverages, such as the lighter beers and natural wines, is therefore mainly due to the fact that the bulk of the fluid makes it difficult for the drinker to consume a very large dose of alcohol within a moderate period.'

"Page 108: 'Food, when taken with alcohol, dilutes it, and so decreases the irritant action of strong alcoholic beverages upon the lining membrane of the stomach.'

"Page 132: '* * * (ii.) To avoid direct injury to the mucous membrane of the stomach, alcohol should not be taken in concentrated form and without food.'

"I have searched the literature upon the subject to learn whether or not the alcohol contained in certain beverages is rendered less intoxicating by the presence of other substances in such beverages, and I find that competent authorities state that the alcohol contained in certain beverages is rendered less intoxicating by the presence of other substances in such beverages. I quote from the 'Dispensatory of the United States of America,' by George B. Wood and Dr. Franklin Bache, copyright 1907, 19th edition, revised and rewritten by the following authorities:

"H. C. Wood, M. D., LL. D., professor on 'materia medica and therapeutics' in the University of Pennsylvania; Joseph P. Rennington, Ph. M. F. G. S., professor of 'theory and practice of pharmacy' in the Philadelphia College of Pharmacy; Samuel P. Satles, Ph. D., LL. D., professor of chemistry in the Philadelphia College of Pharmacy; Albert P. Lyons, M. D., member of committee of revision of the pharmacopea of the United States of America; Horatio C. Wood, jr., M. D., demonstrator of pharmacy and dynamics in the University of Pennsylvania. According to these authorities (p. 1343):

"'The intoxicating ingredient in all wines is the alcohol they contain, and hence their relative strength depends upon the quantity of that substance entering into their composition. The alcohol, however, naturally in wine is so blended with the other constituents as to be in a modified state which renders it less intoxicating and injurious than the same quantity of alcohol separated by distillation and diluted with water.'

"That an action similar to that referred to, with reference to the alcohol in wine, also occurs in beer is more than likely in view of the complex chemistry of beer. Beer, according to the said dispensatory (p. 1345) mentioned above, has the following composition:

"'All malt liquors contain, besides water and alcohol, solid substances which together constitute the so-called extract, i. e., that which is left behind when the water and alcohol are evaporated. The most important of these are dextrine, grape sugar, glycerine, succinic, acetic, lactic, propionic, and glucic acids, carbon dioxide, albumin, and albuminous principles, bitter and resinous matters and essential oil from the hop, alkaline and earthy salts.'

"VI. I have read in 'The nineteenth century and after,' July, 1915, the opinion of Sir Lauder Brunton, Bart., M. D., F. R. S., in reference to alcoholic intoxication, from which article I quote the following:

"'The action of alcohol varies very much, not only according to the quantity that is drunk, but according to the form and to the times when it is taken in order to produce its effects. Its chief action is on the brain, and it can only produce its full effect when it is present in a certain proportion in the blood circulating through that organ. But the amount in the blood depends upon the difference between the rate at which alcohol enters the blood and passes out of it. When alcohol is taken in a very dilute form it can only be absorbed slowly from the digestive canal, and all the time that absorption is going on excretion is likewise occurring, so that there is never enough alcohol present in the blood at one time to produce the full narcotic effects. It is almost impossible for a man to get dead drunk on small beer or thin wine, and, indeed, on these beverages he can hardly even reach the stages of excitement, or commencing narcosis; or, as a man is said to have complained, "he didn't get no forrarder with them." For a man to become dead drunk he must take a considerable quantity of alcohol and in a concentrated form.'

"I know that the medicinal dose of whisky for an infant of over 4 months is from 30 to 40 minims every four hours, which is the approximate amount of alcohol contained in 2 ounces of beer with an alcoholic content of two and three-quarters (2.75) per cent. I know this to be the dose as prescribed in the National Standard Dispensatory, edition 1908, edited by recognized authorities.

"VII. I am familiar with the experiments conducted by many observers with reference to the rapidity with which alcohol is absorbed after taking, and know that all authorities agree that alcohol is much more rapidly absorbed when the stomach is empty than when the stomach is filled with mixed foodstuffs. Thus Professor Cushny, in his work, Pharmacology and Therapeutics, says:

"Page 192: 'The alcohol of beer is comparatively slowly absorbed owing to the colloid constituents.' * * *

"Page 190: 'Oxidation of alcohol begins almost as soon as absorption.'

"VIII. I have made a calculation of the quantity of beer with an alcoholic content of two and three-quarters (2.75) per cent which an individual would have to drink in order to have 0.153 per cent of alcohol in his blood, and I find that it would require in excess of 1 gallon, which quantity would have to be within the body at one time. It would also be necessary for all the alcohol contained in such quantity of this beer to have been absorbed and be circulating within the blood in order to have 0.153 per cent of alcohol in the blood. That this is impossible is apparent from the fact that the adult stomach holds in the average less than 3 pints, and that a considerable portion of the capacity of the stomach would be taken up with the gaseous substances in the beer, especially the carbon dioxide, and, further, owing to the fact that the alcohol of beer is comparatively slowly absorbed because of its colloid constituents, as stated by Professor Cushny.

"I quote as my authority for the statement that the stomach usually holds less than 3 pints from Human Anatomy, by Thomas Dwight, M. D., LL. D., Parkman professor of anatomy in Harvard University; J. Playfair McMurrick, Ph. D., professor of anatomy in the University of Michigan; Carl Hammann, M. D., professor of anatomy in Western Reserve University; George A. Piersol, M. D., Sc. D., professor of anatomy in the University of Pennsylvania; J. William White, M. D., Ph. D., LL. D.; John Rhea Barton, professor of surgery in the University of Pennsylvania; John C. Heisler, M. D., professor of anatomy in the Medico-Chirurgical College; edited by George A. Piersol, volume 2, sixth edition, 1918, page 1619:

"'Average adult capacity (of the stomach) is said to range from 600 to 2,000 c. c. (1.25–4.25 pints). * * * average of 1,200 c. c. 2.50 pints.'

"I have learned that alcohol in the stomach is rapidly diluted by the entrance into the stomach of water from the blood, upon which point I quote from 'Food and Dietetics,' fourth edition, 1917, page 340, by Robert Hutchison, M. D., Edin. F. R. C. P. Physician to the London Hospital:

"'The passage of alcohol out of the stomach into the blood is counterbalanced by a flow of water from the blood into the stomach. The "endosmotic equivalent," as it is called, of absolute alcohol for animal membrane is 4.13, and thus means that for every gram of alcohol which passes in one direction 4.13 grams of water pass in the other. If, then, alcohol be administered to a patient with a dilated stomach, the result may be that the total amount of fluid in the organ is ultimately increased.'

"IX. I have read the book published by Dr. William Edward Fitch, M. D., major, Medical Reserve Corps, U. S. A., formerly lecturer on surgery at Fordham University School of Medicine, and 40 contributors, published by permission of the Surgeon General of the United States Army, 1918, entitled 'Dietotherapy,' and find the following:

"'Genuine malt liquors can be produced of low alcoholic strength (2 per cent alcohol), these are practically nonintoxicating.'

"Dr. W. Gilman Thompson, professor of clinical medicine in the Cornell University Medical College, New York City, who states on page 273 of his book entitled 'Practical Dietetics':

"'As a preventive of drunkenness and the evils of chronic alcoholism, the introduction of the milder malt liquors into this country to partially supersede the use of strong spirits has proved a decided advantage.'

"X. I am informed by George W. Whiteside, Esq., one of the counsel of the complainant herein, that the legal definition of intoxication which he submitted to the various experts he had made affidavits here, is as follows:

"'Intoxicating liquors are those liquors which are intended for use, as, or capable of being used as, a beverage, and which contain alcohol in such proportion or per cent that when consumed in any quantity that may practically be drunk by an ordinary man, or in any quantity that the human stomach can ordinarily hold, will produce a condition commonly known as intoxication or drunkenness. Drunkenness or intoxication is a materially abnormal mental or physical condition, manifesting itself in the loss of the ordinary control of the mental faculties or bodily functions to a substantial extent.'

"XI. I have treated, in the course of my professional work, a large number of patients suffering from alcoholism in various forms, and I have repeatedly observed that men who would get drunk from whisky would lead sober lives when they drank beer in its stead, and I have often advised the drinking of beer as a means of combating drunkenness.

"I am familiar with the substance known as 'war beer,' and I have made extensive inquiries as to its effects, especially with reference to intoxication, and I have failed to learn of a single instance in which the drinking of said substance was the cause of intoxication. As a result of my studies and observation and professional relations with persons addicted to the use of drink and drugs, I am of the opinion that beer containing 2¾ per cent by weight, of alcohol is a nonintoxicating beverage.

"CHARLES A. ROSEWATER."

While we are making ready to tap the till of the Treasury for more than $50,000,000 for the coming year, the national demand for reduction of taxes is asserting itself with intensified insistence every day.

Business, agriculture, wage earning and salaries, the professions, every branch of commercial, financial, and industrial activity, the population in its dual rôle of producer and consumer, are paying the toll of exorbitant taxes.

But not the bootleggers. The bootlegging traffic, which is the creature and consequence of prohibition, pays no taxes. Its profits are enormous and it gets them scot-free. (Buffalo Times.)

A Washington correspondent of the Post-Dispatch recalls a prophecy that the enforcement of the Volstead Act would eventualy cost the Government annually $200,000,000. We have not yet reached that tremendous tax, but we are speeding along toward it, as the figures show. From the modest $350,000 in 1920 to the 1925 assessment is a rate of progression that brings the predicted cost well within sight.

We believe it is a mistake to assume that the American taxpayer, like a patient beast of burden, will bear any yoke fanaticism may impose. It is a mistake, too, for the fanatics and politicians to pretend that prohibition enforced at such a price is constitutional prohibition or statutory prohibition, or any brand of legal prohibition. It is prohibition by sheer force. And force begets force. (St. Louis Post-Dispatch.)

There are many who doubt the ability of the Government to strictly enforce prohibition, no matter how much money it may spend in the effort. There are some things that are impossible of accomplishment. (Trenton (N. J.) Times.)

The question of greatest concern is, Why should there be such a persistent and continually increasing opposition to a law of the land? Is it because the law is so obnoxious that public sentiment does not sustain it? The illegal agencies of liquor traffic could not continue in business if they found the selling market closed against them. (Wilmington Every Evening.)

If the demand for the enforcement of the law is based on justice and a regard for orderly government, as of course it is, why should it be limited to one amendment? Why is the enforcement of the eighteenth amendment so much more important than the fifteenth amendment that a huge appropriation should be made to enforce the one and an appropriation to enforce the other withheld? If we are to have a spotted Constitution, in addition to the spots created by canal immunity and amendment by treaty, it is time we knew it and prepared ourselves to accept it. But why should we? (New Haven Journal-Courier.)

Violation of the Volstead Act is so widespread that the radical drys, in attempts to enforce this unreasonably drastic law, are not only calling for many more millions of dollars for enforcement agencies but are resorting to coercion that violates article 4 of the Bill of Rights.

The proposed chain of boats along the Atlantic coast could be made—though of course it will not be—absolutely smuggler proof; it could be continued across the country along the northern border, down the Pacific coast, and back to the Atlantic coast along the southern border and the Gulf coast, and there would still remain the "moonshine" and the home-brew. Even the "moonshine" could be dried up largely, but probably not wholly, by a great army of dry agents, the inland arm of the coast and border forces, and yet the home-brewers would remain to be reckoned with.

And what would the reckoning be? Would there be unrestricted search and seizure, such as the Louisiana prohibition chief is reported to have ordered his agents to resort to, and such as the dry agents of Pennsylvania were attempting until the courts in that State, awakening to the fact that the fourth amendment of the Constitution is threatened, recently called a halt?

There is no chance for betterment of the situation until the people themselves decide that the Volstead Act is unreasonable and demand that it be changed. Some time that demand will be made. Even the skilled maneuverings of the Wheelers and Andersons will not always deceive the people and prevent them from speaking their mind. In Canada the people have been speaking. Soon or late they will do likewise in the United States. (Buffalo Courier.)

The eighteenth amendment specifies "intoxicating" liquors. Congress, in the one-half of 1 per cent provision of the Volstead Act, gave a definition of intoxicating liquors which even the Anti-Saloon League attorney had to admit is false.

The duty of Congress to interpret the eighteenth amendment in accordance with truth is not set aside by the right of Congress to make any dishonest interpretation it sees fit.

Secretary Hughes might contend that if Congress can pervert the eighteenth amendment into a lying definition of intoxicating liquor, a treaty ought to be permitted to bend the same amendment enough to let foreign vessels bring their liquor supplies into American waters under seal. (New York Evening World.)

Federal trade statistics published in Chicago furnish a conclusive answer to the loose thinkers who deny the stimulating effect of prohibition on the Nation's economic life. The 1923 grape crop was the largest in the history of the country. Eighty thousand carloads of grapes were shipped this year, as against 37,000 in 1921. What is more impressive, as the output has more than doubled, the price has more than trebled. The wheat farmer and the cotton planter are struggling against the difficulty that the more they grow, the less they will get for it. No such prospect disturbs the grape grower. There is a demand for all he can raise and more at constantly rising prices. (New York Times.)

Mr. E. Clemens Horst, who farms 6,000 acres of land of a large variety of orchard and field crops in California, has published an article on "What it costs the farmer for prohibition of nonintoxicating beverages." Mr. Horst says that "in the last few years of prohibition the annual consumption of barley (or its equivalent in other grains and sugar) by brewers of admittedy nonintoxicating 2¾ per cent American beers amounted to 135,000,000 bushels, which required about 8,000 square miles of American farm lands for its production." He declares that the destruction of the home market for barley by the passage of the Volstead Act is largely responsible for the present depression of the grain farmers. There is no doubt that a good deal of wheat is being grown on land that was formerly used for barley.

Householders are the object of solicitous attention by enterprising vendors of new methods of turning out home beverages. One of the latest is a California grape brick, which is a dehydrated form of California grapes. Eighty per cent of the weight of grapes is said to be pure water, which is squeesed out in the drying process. The directions "are given to home owners to produce their legally allowed 200 gallons berry and fruit juices for home use or for medicinal or sacramental purposes," and the announcement says: "Protect yourselves against cheap, possibly poisonous, concoctions. Make your own home beverages and be sure of what you drink."

From Germany comes an offer of a "dry substance" for regenerating the original beverage—such, for example, as sherry, port,

Burgundy, Rhine wines, champagne, whisky, beers, and cordials. The manufacturer of them says: "I do not propose to send you alcohol but a substance from which you can prepare the various beverages with their regular, usual content of alcohol; my offer does, therefore, not interfere with the laws of your country."

Addressing the semiannual convention of the Archdiocesan Catholic Total Abstinence Union of Boston, the Rev. Dr. Maurice J. O'Connor said:

"Prohibition enforcement, as now exemplified, is a scandal to the Nation. Until public opinion has been captured in its behalf prohibition will never be a complete success. Just as sometimes a house of perfect structure is raised upon a temporary foundation, so the eighteenth amendment, a valid law, has been set over the American people before the foundation for it was solidly laid. Prohibition will not succeed until it becomes auto-prohibitive with each individual." (America.)

The National Security League publishes an address on "The spirit of America," by its president, S. Stanwood Menken. Discussing the effect of prohibition he says:

"The restrictions of the eighteenth amendment have created many lawbreakers who wrongly feel that their appetites justify violation of the statutes. A nation half lawful and half lawless can but fail of its ideals. This question is the greatest moral issue that confronts the country, and the act must either be obeyed, modified, or repealed. It has brought about a contempt for law and order which has struck at the soul of our people. If not changed, it will wreck our moral fiber, bringing far-reaching evils, greater than those it was intended to cure. Temperance, the abolition of the saloon, the protection of the weak from temptation, are essentials, but laws which restrict the lifelong habits of millions of self-contained men have no place on our statute books."

Israel Zangwill says:

"There are more cranks to the square mile in the United States than in any other country in the world.

"Prohibition? Is it that you are children in a land of make-believe and like this pretense of law keeping? Or is it a genuine sense of humor? I have not been in a private home in this country in which I was not offered a drink."

At a recent meeting of the Mutual Life Underwriters' National Association Dr. J. B. Jacks, of Chicago, stated that:

"Ninety-nine per cent of the whisky now being drunk is redistilled denatured alcohol, colored with caramel, flavored with synthetic ethers, and given a bead by fusel oil and soap bark."

This is apparently confirmed by a similar statement sponsored by a medical attaché of the prohibition enforcement bureau at Washington. The Springfield (Mass.) Union declares editorially that:

"Both statements, if correct, reveal that the liquor smuggled into the United States from Canada, from beyond the 3-mile limit along the Atlantic seaboard, from Mexico, and also along the Pacific seaboard, represents only 1 per cent of the liquor consumed in this country."

The editor says:

"If the total of the genuine liquor surreptitiously brought into the country is only 1 per cent of the quantity consumed, what comes in from the rum fleets must be considerably less than one-half of 1 per cent.

"The $28,500,000 Coast Guard program savors of hunting rabbits with a 16-inch naval gun, or utilising a train of elephants in a flea hunt."

The superintendent of Federal prisons reports that the number of United States prisoners continues rapidly to increase, and that the three Federal prisons were filled to capacity last year, and additional prison facilities are necessary.

The prohibition commissioner reports 82,912 arrests in the 14 months from July, 1922, to September, 1923.

The United States marshal for Minnesota reports that the county jails in that State are filled to overflowing with persons convicted of violating the prohibition laws, and he is seeking additional jail accommodations for bootleggers who are awaiting trial.

According to the Los Angeles Times:

"The Detroit News recently investigated the liquor situation in their city and unearthed some startling facts. They found that the courts were completely paralyzed, the bootleggers numbered thousands, and that the city was in the throes of a 'saturnalia of crime—murder, theft, and pillage.'

"In no other place in the United States has the collapse of prohibition been so complete. After a thorough study of the reports brought in, the newspaper announced that Detroit's bill for liquid refreshment averaged $2,000,000 a week.

"Ninety-seven men have been murdered by the rum runners, this number not taking into account the many who have died from consuming poisonous 'hooch.'

"Even the high-school children have fallen victims to the liquor, numbers having been arrested for carrying flasks to school, and whole families have been brought into court for staging riotous celebrations in their homes."

Police authorities in Reading, Pa., have been called upon to investigate the number of cases of drunkenness amongst schoolboys. According to press dispatches:

"It is believed that a regular 'moonshine speakeasy' is operated in one section of the city, with schoolboys as the principal patrons."

The Illinois papers report that recent arrests in Springfield and other cities in Illinois have revealed sources of liquor supply that has found its way to high-school students.

According to the New York Times:

"Ever since the Volstead Act defined the eighteenth amendment the college authorities have been in a quandary what to do about it. Naturally it is difficult to obtain precise data regarding the extent to which the act is violated in the colleges, but information from Harvard, Princeton, and Yale, together with reports from other seats of learning, indicates that the effect seems to have been to drive many students from the comparative moderation of the last decade.

"At Princeton, Harvard, and Yale, where drinking has perhaps declined, drunkenness has apparently increased. Yet what drinking is done is done under cover."

The forum department of the New Haven (Conn.) Journal-Courier publishes a letter from Mr. Horace D. Taft, "The gifted head master of Taft's school at Watertown," in which he says:

"The adoption of the eighteenth amendment and the passage of the Volstead Act have been followed over a considerable section of the country by an orgy of lawbreaking and corruption. The police and detective services of the Nation and the States have been corrupted and the rottenness has extended far and wide, reaching the officials of many grades and kinds, and evidently involving conspiracies on a great scale. Moreover, the steady and defiant flaunting of the law and amendment has had a dreadful demoralising effect on large classes of people, especially young people, and has greatly increased the already growing disregard of law and civic duty."

The Indianapolis News says:

"Indianapolis people who were shocked recently when they learned that liquor was being sold to high-school pupils in a northern Indiana city must have received a greater shock when they read that the same thing is being done in Indianapolis."

"Thirty Yale students 'on carpet' for making own hooch.—Put kick in grape juice is charge.—Drunken orgies at University of Wisconsin under probe." (Brooklyn Eagle.)

Mr. William Dudley Foulke, president of the National Civil Service League, is reported in the Baltimore Sun as having stated in a public address there, that—

"Enforcement at the present time is prostituted by the services of men who have sold themselves for base gold and become the allies of bootleggers and gunmen. * * * With few exceptions, directors and agents have been exposed as crooks with startling rapidity. In Pennsylvania, New York, Wisconsin, Montana, Chicago, and elsewhere, director after director has been replaced or sent to the penitentiary. * * * Instead of putting the plain facts before the people and making an open fight, the Anti-Saloon League has tried to hush up the scandals caused by the corruption of the officers who violate the laws they have sworn to enforce."

The prohibition enforcement act has corrupted the Federal service to an extent never before known in the history of the Republic. Many of them have become bootleggers of liquors that they have confiscated. It has so uprooted respect for all law that crimes of intense violence have swept the country from coast to coast to such an extent that no citizen knows today when he is secure in his life and his property.

The recent shooting of Senator GREEN in Washington is one evidence of this.

Where is the wrong for the people to urge a modification of the enforcement act? Only 2½ per cent of the American people ever voted for prohibition.

The records of the secretaries of the several States show that only 2½ per cent of the American people ever voted for prohibition as a state-wide proposition. On the matter of ratification of the eighteenth amendment the people were given no opportunity to express their sentiment at the polls.

There are 15 States in which prohibition had not been adopted as a state-wide program when the eighteenth amendment was ratified. These 15 States had a population in 1920 of 50,257,517.

There were 23 States that had adopted state-wide prohibition by act of the legislature—but which had not submitted the question to a vote of the people of the States. These States had a population of 22,014,831.

There were 23 States that had adopted state-wide prohibition by a vote of the people. These 23 States had a population of 33,000,701.

The tables herein show clearly that the people of 25 States, having a population of 72,272,348, had not given their consent at the polls to state-wide prohibition, while States having a population of only 33,000,701 had adopted state-wide prohibition at the polls. In the 23 States, 2,666,408 votes were cast for prohibition and 2,104,906 against it. The majority was 561,502—just about equal to the majority that the State of Illinois cast in favor of beer and light wines in the referendum of November, 1922.

In the state-wide elections the saloon was the principal issue. The following table shows the States that had state-wide prohibition by popular vote, and the vote cast:

	Population.	Dry.	Wet.

REFERENDUM OF WET AND DRY SENTIMENT.

EDGEWATER BEACH HOTEL,
Chicago, Ill., March 4, 1924.

Congressman L. C. DYER,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: There being just concluded from the Zenith-Edgewater Beach Hotel broadcasting station WJAZ a survey of the "wet" and "dry" sentiment of the country that in many ways is the most comprehensive ever undertaken. Believing you will be interested in a reflection of this survey, which was by means of a telegraphic referendum, we are inclosing herewith a sheet showing the tabulated returns according to the city of Chicago and the various States of the Union.

Nearly 48,000 men and women throughout the United States telegraphed station WJAZ between the hour 10 p. m. Saturday night, March 8, and 10 p. m. Sunday night, March 9. This tremendous volume of telegrams—more than four times as great a number as ever has been addressed to any one institution in any 24 hours heretofore—is in itself a startling commentary on the depth of feeling the people of the United States have on this issue.

These 48,000 people telegraphed their votes from every State in the Union, from homes on farms and in cities, from clubs and hotels, from mansions and from bungalows. No truer reflection of public opinion on the subject could be obtained, the writer believes.

A brief history of the manner in which this referendum came to be taken and the precautions taken to see that there could be no opportunity for "padding" by any group or interest may be of some value to you in arriving at a full understanding of its nature.

Several weeks ago the writer read to the audience of WJAZ a newspaper interview with Congressman SHERWOOD attacking the prohibition legislation. This reading was followed by a storm of protest from the "dry" element of our listeners and an equal volume of commendatory communications from the "wet" faction. I was requested to read a reply by the Hon. Wayne B. Wheeler, attorney for the Anti-Saloon League of America, and did so. Another deluge of telephone, telegraph, and mail communications followed.

The effect of these two announcements was so spontaneous and so startling that I decided to give the great public reached by our station an opportunity to express its views on the current proposals to modify the Volstead Act by votes, and to compensate them for the effort and expense entailed arranged to give away articles of value in excess of $4,800, including a Peerless automobile and five Zenith receiving sets.

For more than a week before the opening of the poll we announced the conditions and rules from station WJAZ, but in order to prevent any possibility of padding we told our audience that a "code word" would be given at the beginning of the contest and that only votes containing that word would be counted. This procedure was followed.

The writer then got in touch with leaders of the "wet" and "dry" factions in Chicago and invited them to send two speakers each to deliver 10-minute talks. These speakers were: For the "wets," Mr. Clarence S. Darrow, noted criminal attorney, author, and lecturer, and Mr. C. A. Windle, editor of the Iconoclast, and a writer and lecturer of note; for the "drys," Mr. O. G. Christgau, editor of The American Issue, organ of the prohibition forces, and Mr. John W. Langley, lecturer, organizer, and superintendent of the Chicago Anti-Saloon League.

On Saturday evening the four speakers were allowed to broadcast their views shortly after the announcement of the code word. Mr. Christgau and Mr. Darrow were the first speakers and an hour later we turned the microphone over to Mr. Windle and Mr. Langley. On Sunday afternoon Mr. Darrow and Mr. Langley debated, and on Sunday evening Mr. Christgau and Mr. Windle.

Before the first of the speakers had finished the telegrams began pouring in. A corps of twelve sorters and counters took charge of them and after dividing them into "wet" and "dry" groups, numbered them with automatic numbering machines so that the result of the voting was kept up to date at all times.

We specified that all votes must be telegraphed because of the means of awarding the automobile, receiving sets, etc. This was done by means of a drawing. But this specification precluded the probability of any "padding" for the reason that the average cost of the telegram was 75 cents each and at that figure "padding" would prove an expensive bit of strategy.

It seems to me that the fact that the American public paid nearly $35,000 to vote in this poll indicates more clearly than any other thing could the intensity with which it feels on this subject. But there is another striking feature in the report of the telegraph companies' officials that for hours at a time residents of many cities were unable to get telephone connection with the telegraph offices for the purpose of filing telegrams to us and that in Chicago and its suburbs patrons stood in line for hours waiting for an opportunity to file their votes.

The telegraph operator of the town of Ricketts, Iowa, reported that out of a population of 175, 35 had filed votes.

Many of the statistics and statements furnished herein are almost unbelievable, but in every case we are able to substantiate them either by the telegrams themselves or by the testimony of the telegraph officials.

Trusting you may find something of value to you in this communication, and with kindest regards, I am

Cordially yours,

E. F. MCDONALD, Jr.,
Zenith-Edgewater Beach Hotel Broadcasting Station.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

COAST GUARD.

For additional motor boats and their equipment for the use of the Coast Guard in enforcing the laws of the United States and in performing the duties with which the Coast Guard is charged, to be constructed or purchased in the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury, and for repairs or alterations to or for equipping and placing in commission vessels or boats transferred from the Navy Department to the Treasury Department for the use of the Coast Guard, $12,194,900, to remain available until June 30, 1925.

Mr. HILL of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. HILL of Maryland. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, the paragraphs of the deficiency appropriation bill which you are now reading relate to the Coast Guard, and make total appropriations of $13,887,007.07. The first two paragraphs of these appropriations are as follows:

For additional motor boats and their equipment for the use of the Coast Guard in enforcing the laws of the United States and in performing the duties with which the Coast Guard is charged, to be constructed or purchased in the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury, and for repairs or alterations to or for equipping and placing in commission vessels or boats transferred from the Navy Department to the Treasury Department for the use of the Coast Guard, $12,194,900, to remain available until June 30, 1925;

For pay and allowances prescribed by law for commissioned officers, cadets and cadet engineers, warrant officers, petty officers, and other enlisted men, active and retired, temporary cooks and surfmen, substitute surfmen, and one civilian instructor, $945,179;

Although perhaps subject to a point of order as to form, these appropriations were made in order yesterday by the passage of House bill 6815, a bill to authorize a "temporary increase of the Coast Guard for law enforcement." I doubt seriously that the proposed increase will be "temporary," because the words "law enforcement" refer to the attempted enforcement of the Volstead Act. A point of order as to form would be of no avail, since they could readily be put in proper form, because of House bill 6815, which will have passed the Senate by the time this bill arrives there.

I discussed House bill 6815 during its consideration and yesterday offered a substitute. I refer to page 4090 of the RECORD, which is as follows:

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Maryland.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, may I suggest that the gentleman from Maryland is a member of the majority, from which side this bill comes, and I am on the minority side of the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Maryland. The Clerk will read the motion to recommit.

The Clerk read as follows:

"Mr. HILL of Maryland offers the following motion to recommit the bill to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, with instructions to that committee to report the same back forthwith, with the following amendment: Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

"'That the Secretary of the Navy is authorized to lend to the Department of the Treasury, for the use of the Coast Guard, such vessels of the Navy, with their outfits and armaments, as can be spared by the Navy, and as are adapted to the use of the Coast Guard, with the necessary officers and enlisted men of the Navy to handle the same for temporary needs.'"

A point of order was made, and thereupon I explained the proposed substitute as follows:

Mr. HILL of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, this is a bill which, according to its terms, would temporarily place at the disposition of the Coast Guard certain naval vessels and provide for the construction of certain other vessels and the employment of officers and men by the Coast Guard temporarily in order that the national prohibition enforcement act may be enforced as against alleged smuggling. The bill provides for an ultimate expenditure of $13,000,000 additional to the $10,000,000 already appropriated for the Coast Guard. My substitute provides for the lending to the Coast Guard by the Navy of ships, with their officers, men, and equipment, for the period of the temporary need, which will accomplish that purpose without any additional expense to the American people, and I respectfully submit it is in order.

The pending bill, to which I offer this substitute, would make possible the appropriation of nearly $24,000,000 for the Coast Guard for the coming year, nearly $2,000,000 more than the total cost of the whole United States Navy in 1890. The question here raised has nothing to do with the merits or demerits of prohibition or of the Volstead Act, and should be so considered and voted upon. This is not a question of "wet" or "dry." It presents merely a question of efficient and economical prevention of smuggling. My substitute will save $13,887,007.07 and stop smuggling, if anything will. I submit that my substitute is in order. The Navy was used to prevent the importation of slaves and for various other purposes cited by the Attorney General in the opinion I read here yesterday. If it is true that the Coast Guard can not handle the smuggling situation, let them have the aid of the existing Navy without the waste of nearly $14,000,000 needlessly to create a new Navy. I again suggest my substitute is in order.

The Speaker held my motion to recommit not in order, and made a similar ruling on a more or less similar motion by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON]. The House then passed

H. R. 6815 by a vote of yeas 304, nays 50, not voting 77, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] and I both voting nay.

In view of this vote I shall not move to strike out the pending appropriation, although I think it useless and wasteful. It will not prevent smuggling of liquor even if it should prevent a concentration at certain points. The Mexican and Canadian borders will still be "open." I want to call to your attention some statements before the Appropriations Committee in the recent Treasury Department appropriation bill, and also from the hearings on this bill.

At page 504 of the former occurs the following:

Mr. THATCHER. How are you protecting the international boundary lines between the United States and Mexico and the United States and Canada?

Mr. HAYNES. We have a force of agents working there. In Texas the Texas Rangers are helping us, but their numbers are inadequate for the job.

Mr. THATCHER. They patrol the border?

Mr. HAYNES. Yes; they patrol the border at the strategic points where the smuggling is likely to take place.

The CHAIRMAN. You could not protect every point on the border.

Mr. HAYNES. No; we could not.

It will be of interest for you to compare the estimate of Mr. Haynes, the Federal Prohibition Commissioner, of the smuggling situation with that of Admiral Billard, head of the Coast Guard.

At page 505 of the Treasury bill hearing Mr. Haynes thought the tendency toward bootlegging is decreasing. Here are the exact statements:

The CHAIRMAN. Can you give us any idea of the extent to which the liquor fleet is operating off the Atlantic coast outside the United States; that is, the illicit liquor fleet?

Mr. HAYNES. You mean as to the number of boats?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. HAYNES. I am very sorry I can not give you an accurate estimate on that. The only estimate I can give to you is the estimate brought to me, by rumor largely, by newspaper accounts, and, to a small extent, from personal actual observation.

There were at one time, I am quite satisfied, as many as 15 boats in the entire fleet off the New Jersey coast. But the number fluctuates. They dispose of their cargoes to the small motor boats that run out, and then they go away. They had a good many fatalities, I understand, and a great many accidents. Being pirates and brigands, as they are, they high-jack each other and rob each other, and the number is reduced somewhat in that way.

The CHAIRMAN. They are in the business of robbery?

Mr. HAYNES. Yes; it does not make any difference how they get the money, so long as they get it.

The CHAIRMAN. How does the present situation with regard to bootlegging compare with the same situation a year ago? Is the tendency toward bootlegging increasing or decreasing?

Mr. HAYNES. I do not think the tendency is increasing; I think it is decreasing.

Mr. Haynes thinks "the tendency is decreasing," and yet you are asked to provide for nearly $14,000,000 more of Coast Guard boats to prevent smuggling.

As long as the present Volstead Act remains law, if you sincerely try to enforce it, you will need yearly more and more Coast Guard boats, and the Mexican and Canadian borders are still open. Note what Admiral Billard says as to the permanence of the Coast Guard need. I read from page 693 of the hearings on the pending bill, as follows:

The CHAIRMAN. In order to keep it effectively controlled, you would have to continue it, wouldn't you?

Admiral BILLARD. I should think so.

Mr. GALLIVAN. All of this amount of money?

Mr. BUCHANAN. Oh, no.

Admiral BILLARD. It is just like a police force of a city that prevents crime. If you withdraw the police force, when crime would revive sufficiently to make it necessary to reestablish that force we do not know.

Mr. BUCHANAN. If you once broke it up, perhaps half the force or two-thirds the force maintained would be all that would be necessary.

Mr. GALLIVAN. That is what I mean.

Admiral BILLARD. That, in my judgment, would depend upon conditions as they arose. Certainly I can not forecast or prophesy anything about it.

Mr. BUCHANAN. You would certainly have to keep the organization up, or they would come back.

The CHAIRMAN. I think it is just as well to be frank about it. It looks to me that if you establish a police force to enforce a law or to prevent the commission of a crime, you would have to keep up the police force.

We are therefore making the first appropriation for a naval prohibition police force, which will be needed as long as the Volstead Act is to be enforced. We are providing for such a force more this year than the Navy cost in 1890. Mr. Haynes says that enforcement of the Volstead Act daily grows more effective. The picture that the Coast Guard draws, however, would seem to require the full Navy of the United States, not merely an augmented Coast Guard. Note again the hearings on the present bill at page 655:

From what has just been said it should be apparent that:

(a) The enemy is engaged in open and organized warfare on the Constitution.

(b) He is practically unhampered in his operations by this or any other Government.

(c) He is introducing into this country at least 100,000 cases per month by way of the Atlantic and Gulf coasts.

In considering this matter, the prohibition feature or liquor question should be eliminated from the mind. Were the traffic confined to diamonds, for example, its bad effect would be the same.

Nonenforcement of the law is bringing the National Government and the very Constitution itself into contempt, and, what is almost equally bad, is causing an ever-increasing flow of money into the coffers of the underworld. This money is being used to finance all sorts of criminal ventures, and is, I believe, one of the prime causes of the increase of crime.

Mr. GALLIVAN. Who is saying this?

Commander ROOT. I am saying this.

However, it seems to me, that in preparing to arrive at a decision, that we should divest our minds of even the latter consideration and reduce the question to its most simple terms, those involving only the support of the Constitution.

As this statement and further investigation can lead to but one conclusion, it is expected that the full force, for which we have asked, will be provided without delay. This force, by itself alone, will not be sufficient. Old laws must be strengthened and new laws written.

The treaty with Great Britain, ratified by the Senate yesterday, will not help much in the above-described condition. Note what Commander Root says on this at page 657 of the hearings:

The CHAIRMAN. Those are vessels trying to get in with liquor cargoes?

Commander ROOT. Yes, sir; that is where the liquor fleet is now.

The CHAIRMAN. How far out are they from shore?

Commander ROOT. They are probably not more than 7 or 8 miles from Montauk Point.

The CHAIRMAN. If the 12-mile treaty were made effective, that could not happen, could it?

Commander ROOT. They would simply have to move out 2 or 3 miles farther.

The conditions at sea as reported by the Coast Guard demand more than you are here asked to provide, if you really take seriously the reports made. But note: The Coast Guard officers have not deemed it necessary to consult with the Federal prohibition commissioner. I quote to you from page 646 of the hearings:

Mr. GALLIVAN. Have you conferred with the prohibition-enforcement officers as to the extent of this so-called smuggling and illegal operation?

Commander ROOT. No, sir; I have had no communication with them whatever.

Admiral BILLARD. May I interject, Mr. Chairman, because I see no reason why this committee should not have the information, that, as I understand it, part of Commander Root's information is obtained from the State Department with respect to exportations——

Mr. GALLIVAN (interposing). I am speaking of importations.

Admiral BILLARD. Well, the reports of the State Department's foreign officers would be on exportations to the West Indies and the like. And I will say to you, Mr. GALLIVAN, that to my knowledge he has not conferred with the prohibition-enforcement people on this matter. He may have one or two of their routine reports.

Commander Root went into detail on the difficulties with which the Coast Guard must cope and I regret that there seems to be a lack of coordination between his branch of the service and that of Mr. Haynes. One can not share Mr. Haynes's optimism after reading in full what Commander Root says, and I confess I must agree with the closing remarks of one of the secret agents he quotes on page 650.

Commander Root says, at that point of his statement before the Appropriations Committee, as follows:

For your further information relative to these islands I will now quote in full and verbatim three reports from another United States secret agent stationed at Nassau. The reports are dated January 26 and 28, 1924.

"Since my last favor to you, beg to advise that the liquor business of exporting to the States from Nassau has fallen off at least 75 per cent, but at West End, Grand Bahama, and at Gun Key Lighthouse Anchorage business has increased 100 per cent. At Gun Key there are now at least 30 vessels owned by Nassau dealers selling booze. At West End, Grand Bahama, business has increased so much that this Government has erected several large bonded warehouses. Being only 60 miles from Palm Beach, all the boats go there for booze that used to come to Nassau. There is on an average of 10 to 20 boats daily calling at West End, carrying from 200 to 1,000 cases each. So you can see what is doing. This booze is flowing into Jacksonville, via Mayport (Mosquito Inlet), Palm Beach, West Palm Beach, Stuart, Fort Pierce, St. Augustine, Fernandina, main ports in Florida.

"From West End also quite a few large boats are running booze to Charleston, S. C. From West End sub-marine chasers, etc., are being used. Lots of this booze is shipped by automobiles to eastern and western points from the above places. Quite a lot goes to Fernandina and St. Augustine. There must be something radically wrong with the agents you have in the above sections, as it is being distributed wide open, and you can get all the drinks you want in any of the hotels in Florida. There are some big rings working. At Fernandina there is one Jim Paxton, who is a big handler of liquors from West End and Cuba, who has been operating since the prohibition law has been in effect. Also at water front, and one Cracker Johnson has been running booze into West Palm Beach since prohibition inception, and still at it. The 'pull' at this place is great. I have seen graft money handed over to some of your agents. Also the sheriff and undersheriffs are in the game of making easy money. You want to get a clean sweep up like you had done at Savannah with that gang, but they are still operating."

The secret agent says: "You can get all the drinks you want in any of the hotels in Florida." He also says he has "seen graft money handed over to some of your agents," and that "the sheriff and undersheriffs are in the game of making easy money."

Gentlemen, we are all for honest enforcement of the laws of the United States, but will this further expenditure of nearly $14,000,000 help? It is either too much to waste or too little to be effective. You can spend your time better by passing House Resolution 153, which is as follows:

House Resolution 153.

Whereas on May 15, 1922, and again on August 22, 1922, Representative HILL, of Maryland, requested from the Secretary of the Treasury the removal of the Federal prohibition commissioner because of nonfeasance and malfeasance in office; and

Whereas on the 16th day of January, 1924, in the city of Washington, before the convention of the Anti-Saloon League, Governor Pinchot, of Pennsylvania, charged that the enforcement of the national prohibition act under the said Federal prohibition commissioner was an entire failure, using the following words, to wit: "I know of no scandal in our national history to compare with it. A scandal of half these proportions in any other branch of the Government's work would lead at once to a congressional investigation. I demand one."

Resolved, That a committee consisting of five Representatives of the Sixty-eighth Congress, to be appointed by the Speaker of the House, is authorized and directed to investigate the office of the Federal prohibition commissioner in the Bureau of Internal Revenue of the Treasury Department, and the whole matter of the failure of enforcement of the national prohibition act by the Federal Government, and all other matters and conditions in the premises set forth, and to report their findings, together with recommendations for the improvement of such conditions, forthwith to this session of Congress. Such committee is authorized to send for persons and papers, to administer oaths to witnesses, and to incur necessary expenses for clerical and other services not exceeding $20,000, which shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

The apparent lack of coordination between Mr. Haynes and the Coast Guard and the disclosures of Commander Root's secret agents are worthy of your consideration.

Mr. Chairman, the legislative policy for this appropriation for the Coast Guard is provided for in the bill H. R. 6815, which was the subject of lengthy discussion a few days ago and which passed the House yesterday. However, the hearings before the Committee on Appropriations on this subject are so very interesting and important that I have made the above extracts for your benefit. [Applause.]

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Chairman, I wish to ask the chairman of the committee whether this is not an additional amount? Or is this just an authorization?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. TAGUE. Is there any appropriation for the Coast Guard other than this one item in this bill?

Mr. MADDEN. No; not in this bill. There may be something for unpaid bills, or something of that kind.

Mr. TAGUE. Is there anything for the building of new craft?

Mr. MADDEN. That is all included in this, except for ships from the Navy Department. This provides for additional motor boats and their equipment.

Now, I will tell the gentleman what is proposed in the item. There are 223 cabin cruiser motor boats, to cost $37,500 apiece, and 100 dory-type motor boats, fast boats, about 30 feet long, costing about $8,000 apiece. These are to have very high speed. Then, in addition to that, the 20 torpedo destroyers authorized under the bill we had up yesterday are to be taken over from the Navy Department and rehabilitated at a cost of $100,000 apiece, and put into this service, and two mine sweepers from the Navy, so that when the program is carried out there will be 2 mine sweepers, 20 torpedo-boat destroyers with a speed of 30 knots manned with guns, and there will be 223 cabin cruisers about 75 feet long, very rapid, with first-class motor machinery, and the other 100 dory boats with motor machinery, all very speedy, the idea being to prevent smuggling. For instance, a Coast Guard cutter to-day has a speed of only 10 knots. She may go out and see a ship lying off on the horizon. She may want to discover whether that ship is loaded with contraband liquor. As the condition exists to-day, after she has discovered that the ship is loaded with contraband liquor she has to leave, and while she is gone, looking for some other law violator, the speed boats owned by the smugglers come out from shore and unload this contraband cargo from the ships onto their boats, speed boats, and bring it in and deliver it to those who may want to purchase it.

Now the plan is under this scheme to have picket boats consisting of these cabin cruisers and dory boats, that are just as fast as anybody else's boats, to lie by beside the ship carrying the contraband cargo, and when her speed boats go out to shore to aid in any attempt to capture them or to prevent them from taking their cargo off the ship, and in that way prevent smuggling entirely.

Mr. TAGUE. My reason for asking the question is not that I am interested in the smuggling of liquor at all.

Mr. MADDEN. I thought so, but I thought the gentleman would like to have the information.

Mr. TAGUE. Yes. My purpose was merely to ascertain whether or not we were going to have ships of the Androscoggin type, ships of that kind to be sent up into the district to look after the life and property of men engaged in operations on the high seas.

Mr. MADDEN. All these ships will be able to do that.

Mr. TAGUE. The information I had is that none of these ships can go out and do that kind of work. That was demonstrated off the coast of Maryland a month or two ago, when they sent one of these torpedo boats out to bring in the Indiana. If a revenue-cutter boat had not come along they would have lost all hands on board. I do not care whether they get a smuggler there or not, but I would like to see some protection given to those men and ships.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The gentleman will understand that there is an appropriation for the operation of the revenue-cutter boats from year to year.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas is recognized.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, this item could have been knocked out of the bill if anybody had made a point of order against it, because it is legislation on an appropriation bill not authorized by law.

Mr. MADDEN. I do not agree to that.

Mr. BLANTON. Well, the gentleman would have agreed to it after the Chairman had sustained the point of order. But I did not make it and my friend from Maryland [Mr. HILL] did not know it was subject to a point of order or probably he would have made it.

Mr. HILL of Maryland. I will say to the gentleman from Texas that after the passage of the bill yesterday I considered it was in order.

Mr. BLANTON. I am glad the gentleman thinks that; but that bill does not yet constitute legislation; that would make this item in order, for it is not yet the law. But nobody made the point of order.

Mr. CRAMTON. It would have been the easiest thing in the world to have so shaped it so as to make it clearly not subject to a point of order and yet carry the same amount of money.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman from Michigan knows it was subject to a point of order, but be that as it may, nobody made it. I did not make it and no one else made it. I did not make it for one reason alone. There was a way to stop this smuggling on our coasts, and that would have been to give the President the Navy, and that is the only way. You are not going to stop it with this little added Coast Guard force. It is just like a drop in the bucket, a start on the way, but you can not guard these coasts with that limited force. There are too many hundreds of miles of inlets. You need the Navy and you are going to have to have the Navy before you do guard the coasts properly and before you stop this smuggling.

Yesterday I did everything one Member could do in an attempt to have the Navy used. I made a fight on the floor and tried to get a provision in the bill authorizing the President to use the Navy.

The President wanted to use it. The President went to the Attorney General and asked him for the use of the Navy, but the Attorney General told him he could not have it because he did not have authority of law. We could have given him that authority, so that the Attorney General could no longer claim that, but we did not do it. There were not enough Members here who were in favor of stopping that smuggling in that way.

Mr. CRAMTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. If the gentleman will answer a question for me, I will yield. I want the gentleman to answer me this question: Will he or any other man on this floor deny that the present Secretary of the Treasury is financially interested in distilleries? Will he answer me that?

Mr. CRAMTON. I have no personal knowledge.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman deny it?

Mr. CRAMTON. I have no personal knowledge.

Mr. BLANTON. Well, we all know that to be the fact, and yet we leave this big question of prohibition enforcement in the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury, who is not a law enforcer as to prohibition.

Mr. CRAMTON. May I now ask my question?

Mr. MADDEN. There is this about the Coast Guard——

Mr. BLANTON. If the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] knows better than that about Secretary Mellon, I will yield.

Mr. MADDEN. I will say this: There is one thing about the Coast Guard. It is made up of men who are in the military service.

Mr. BLANTON. I am talking now about the present Secretary of the Treasury. Can the gentleman from Illinois answer my question as to the present Secretary of the Treasury?

Mr. MADDEN. I do not know anything about that, but I do know that these men, when they go to sea, will do the thing that should be done regardless of the Secretary of the Treasury or anybody else, and they will do their duty.

Mr. BLANTON. I have found that men acting under the orders of a superior officer usually do what they think their superior officer would like to have them do.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words in order that I may ask a question of the gentleman from Texas and also answer his question. I have recently had considerable contact with the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Mellon, and have taken up with him an important problem relating to the enforcement of the eighteenth amendment.

Mr. BLANTON. Does the gentleman feel satisfied about it?

Mr. CRAMTON. I feel perfectly satisfied with the cooperation which I have had and the contact I have had, as well as the point of view which the Secretary of the Treasury has maintained throughout all of my interviews with him.

Now, I want to ask a question of the gentleman from Texas, whose views I know are just as positive as mine in favor of the enforcement of the law, but who supported the chimera of enforcement by the Navy instead of by the Coast Guard. Has the gentleman from Texas ever heard the old saying that "a bird in the hand is worth two in the bush"?

Mr. BLANTON. That is the only reason why I did not make a point of order against this item. It is a bird in the hand and is the only thing we have left.

Mr. CRAMTON. I wish the gentleman had discovered that 24 hours earlier.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection the pro forma amendment is withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For furnishing and erecting headstones for the graves of American soldiers in Europe, $548,550, to remain available until expended.

Mr. HILL of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HILL of Maryland: Page 49, line 11, after the word "expended," insert:

"Provided, That none of the money so appropriated shall be expended except for headstones or markers to be placed upon the graves in the American military cemeteries overseas, which shall be of the same general form and design and having the same general effect as the existing wooden markers."

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order, if the gentleman wants to be heard on it.

Mr. HILL of Maryland. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, this amendment is based on the resolution of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ANDREW], which is as follows:

House Concurrent Resolution 16.

Whereas wooden crosses have marked the graves on the battle fields of Europe of American soldiers, sailors, and marines who died in the World War from the first burials in war time until the present day, or markers of like proportion and design bearing the Star of David (instead of the transverse bar) have marked the graves of those of Jewish faith; and

Whereas these wooden symbols have, during and since the World War, been regarded as emblematic of the great sacrifices which that war entailed, have been so treated by poets and artists and have become peculiarly and inseparably associated in the thought of surviving relatives and comrades and of the Nation with these World War graves: Therefore be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the permanent markers to be placed upon the graves in the American military cemeteries overseas shall be of the same general form and design and have the same general effect as the existing wooden markers.

There are at the present time wooden crosses in the cemeteries in France marking the graves of those American soldiers of the Christian faith who died in France. There are wooden Stars of David, the six-point star, marking the graves of those American soldiers that were of the Jewish faith who died in France. These stars and crosses were placed there when these men died and are of the same general, uniform type. There was yesterday a hearing held before the Committee on Military Affairs of the House on the resolution of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ANDREW]. There was a slight change made by him afterwards in the wording of his resolution, and the one I have read is the resolution, slightly changed to conform to the general views expressed at that hearing.

There appeared before the Military Affairs Committee of the House representatives of the American Legion, the representatives of the Gold Star Mothers, and the representatives of the Veterans of Foreign Wars, and of all the service organizations. There also appeared before the Military Affairs Committee of the House the secretary of the American Battle Monuments Commission, to which this House committed the matter of cemeteries and monuments in France. The Military Affairs Committee has not yet made a report on the resolution. The matter of the amount of money here appropriated has been very carefully and fully gone into by the Appropriations Committee in the hearings. The present project of the officers of the Quartermaster General's Department who appeared before the committee is to make oblong tombstones or headstones in the United States and send them to France to replace the crosses that stand there at the present time. The men who served in the war, the American Battle Monuments Commission, the Gold Star Mothers, the American Legion, the Veterans of Foreign Wars Association, all of them, are against putting up in France the solid headstone in place of the crosses and the stars which were placed there when these men were buried.

The Battle Monuments Commission objects to it, and I am told that General Pershing, who is now on his way home from France, now objects to it, and everybody who appeared before the Military Affairs Committee yesterday objects to it, and I can see by reading the testimony before the committee that the chairman of the committee himself in his own mind was not in favor of it but left it to the War Department.

Gentlemen, I submit this amendment is in order. It is a limitation on an expenditure, and I ask that it be held in order and voted on in order that the present situation in the cemeteries of France may remain.

Mr. McKEOWN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL of Maryland. Yes.

Mr. McKEOWN. Is it the idea of the gentleman to maintain the crosses as they are now? What suggestions have these organizations made as to how the graves should be marked?

Mr. HILL of Maryland. Their representation was and their suggestion was that there should be put up in the place of the wooden cross, when it is removed, a cross made either of French stone or of American stone or of bronze or of some durable material, and that there should be put up in place of the wooden Star of David a similar marker, so that the cemeteries would maintain the same appearance they do now.

Mr. McKEOWN. And not have these little markers like they have in this country?

Mr. HILL of Maryland. And not make them look like stoneyards instead of battle graveyards, as they are now.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Maryland has expired.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, before I insist on the point of order I want to read the law:

In the arrangement of the national cemeteries established for the burial of deceased soldiers and sailors, the Secretary of War is hereby directed to have the same inclosed with a good and substantial stone or iron fence, and to cause each grave to be marked with a small headstone or block, which shall be of durable stone and of such design and weight as shall keep it in place when set, and shall bear the name of the soldier and the name of his State inscribed thereon, when the same are known, and also the number of the grave inscribed thereon, corresponding with the number opposite to the name of the party in a register of burials to be kept at each cemetery and at the office of the Quartermaster General, which shall set forth the name, rank, company, regiment, and date of death of the officer or soldier; or, if these are unknown, it shall be so recorded.

This is the law to-day. This $540,000 is being appropriated under the authority of that law.

Mr. McKEOWN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MADDEN. In just a moment. Let me finish this statement, please. Now, the War Department has adopted a design, but the law itself provides that the headstone shall be of stone. I understand the Battle Monuments Commission, or some of them, think there ought to be a different design, and that they ought not to be of stone but should be of bronze.

I am not interested in the difference of opinion between the Quartermaster Department of the Army and the Battle Monuments Commission, but this bill is not the place to legislate on a subject which has not been given any attention or consideration by the House. There was a War Department board which functioned on this question. Let us see who they are, and what happened. One of our distinguished colleagues, sitting here now, was a member of that board when the design proposed under this act was adopted. I read from page 732 of the hearings:

PROCEEDINGS OF BOARD OF OFFICERS TO CONSIDER HEADSTONE FOR WORLD WAR VETERANS.

WASHINGTON, D. C., April 26, 1922.

Pursuant to instructions contained in letter from the Secretary of War, dated July 22, 1921, the board reconvened this date to consider the question of the headstone for the World War veterans, and the following recommendations were made:

"That the headstone be 24 inches high, 13 inches wide, and 4 inches thick, extending into the ground 18 inches, or making a total stone of 42 inches long, 13 inches wide by 4 inches thick.

"That the full name of the soldier, with the State from which he came, his rank, regiment, and division, with date of death, appear on the face of the stone.

"That the rosette at the top carry with it the device of religious faith—a Latin cross for the Christian and the double triangle for the Hebrew faith."

That the relatives be permitted—

"at their own expense, to have placed any inscription in the nature of a text or other suitable quotation or term of endearment that they may desire, providing the number of letters does not exceed 60 letters."

That on the reverse side of the stone will appear the grave number corresponding with the number in the register book of burials in the cemetery.

J. M. WAINWRIGHT,
The Assistant Secretary of War.
JOHN J. PERSHING,
General of the Armies, Chief of Staff.
H. L. ROGERS,
Quartermaster General.

Approved:

JOHN W. WEEKS,
Secretary of War.

The CHAIRMAN. That does not have reference to any particular place?

Major FOSTER. No, sir. This is a World War veteran's headstone.

The CHAIRMAN. No matter where the grave is?

Major FOSTER. Yes, sir; those are our orders.

The CHAIRMAN. General Pershing is the chairman of the Battle Monuments Commission.

Major FOSTER. He was on this commission, too. That shows you how the design of the stone was picked. We were merely ordered to get it.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the cost of this design?

Major FOSTER. That is, the one I am talking about?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes. It is $9.04, is it not?

Major FOSTER. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the cost in France?

Major FOSTER. Delivered?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Major FOSTER. It is a little over $17.

The CHAIRMAN. You buy this monument here?

Major FOSTER. Yes, sir. The cost is $17.90 set up in Europe.

The CHAIRMAN. Could you buy it any cheaper in France?

Major FOSTER. I do not believe so. They can do it if they wish to.

The CHAIRMAN. There is no objection to that?

Major FOSTER. No, sir. But there is very little of that white marble in France, and it is very expensive.

The total cost of the stones, including those that will be destroyed in transit, is $548,550.

I make the point of order against the amendment, because I believe it is contrary to the law.

Mr. HILL of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. HILL of Maryland. I want to say to the committee that the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, as always, in dealing with matters relating to the war, has taken a most generous and broad point of view; and I am glad that he read to you that portion of the hearings, because the question as to these stones seemed always apparent in the chairman's mind. As I said, the American Battle Monuments Commission, at the time the board of officers' report, to be found on page 732 of the hearings, was made, was not in existence, but, fortunately, the former Assistant Secretary of War, our colleague from New York [Mr. WAINWRIGHT], is here, and I know that you would like to hear him on this subject. He, together with General Pershing, was a member of the board of officers which recommended the headstones, in April, 1922, but he now, like General Pershing, favors the crosses and stars as at present existing and as provided for in the pending amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would be very glad to hear from the gentleman from Illinois upon the point of order.

Mr. MADDEN. My point of order is that it is new legislation, and a violation of existing law.

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. Mr. Chairman, I rise to discuss the point of order, but I trust the Chair will not hold me down to too strict a discussion of it at first. This amendment embodies and expresses the very deep sentiment of everyone who is interested in the graves in France. The appearance of the markers at present has been described by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. HILL]. I am not at all embarrassed by the fact that my name appears in connection with the resolution which has been read from the hearings before the committee. The War Department cemetery commission approached the consideration of this subject with a strong disposition in favor of the retention of the present form of markers—namely, the crosses—upon the graves. The question was referred to the Quartermaster General's Department, and we were advised that there were practical difficulties both as to cost and as to the durability of a marker in the form of a cross made out of marble, because the white appearance, the color, is just as important as is the form of the cross. I have no hesitation in saying to the committee that General Pershing, who was General of the Armies and who would naturally have a deep interest in this subject, was very much in favor of the preservation of the crosses; and I was, too, and I still feel that it is most desirable that they should be preserved in permanent form. I believe it can be worked out satisfactorily, and with little, if any, increase in cost.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] has referred to a law which seems in its terms to regulate the form and design of the markers on the soldiers' graves. If I am not mistaken, that law has application only to the graves of soldiers in the United States, and in no way applies to the graves of soldiers overseas.

The CHAIRMAN. Can the gentleman refer the Chair to the authority under which the cemeteries were established and maintained in France?

Mr. MADDEN. The law applies to national cemeteries, and the question here is as to whether a cemetery in France is a national cemetery.

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. These cemeteries were established by the exigencies of the situation on the other side. Each one of those cemeteries was established right after the battles in which these men lost their lives, and I do not know that there is any law applying to the subject. They were established as a result of the stern necessities of warfare.

Mr. McKEOWN. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment to say that this statute on which the gentleman from Illinois relies was passed prior to the establishment of the cemeteries in France and has no relation to them?

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. That is my understanding.

The CHAIRMAN. Can the gentleman inform the Chair whether the cemeteries in France were established pursuant to provisions of the national cemetery act?

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. They were not, I may state with a great deal of confidence.

Mr. MADDEN. Can the gentleman state that of his own knowledge?

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. Yes; I think I can. These cemeteries were not established through any authority of law, I may say for the benefit of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MADDEN. Oh, yes; we authorized the purchase of land for them.

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. These cemeteries were established long before there was any purchase of land.

Mr. MADDEN. That is true.

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. Nor have any of these cemeteries been paid for by any of the money of the United States, except certain additions that have been made to them. My understanding of the situation is that the land in which the bodies of our soldiers lie was ceded to us by the French Government.

Mr. McKEOWN. I would like to say this to the gentleman from Illinois, that the question of the law applying markers to the graves of the World War veterans was enacted in the House by amendment.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, let me read the law that did authorize the purchase of the land:

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized to expend not to exceed $856,680 of the appropriation, disposition of remains of officers, soldiers, and civilian employees, in the act making appropriations for the sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1922, and for other purposes, approved March 4, 1921, for the purchase of such real estate as is necessary to establish suitable burial places in Europe for American military dead and for suitable and necessary improvements thereon, of which not to exceed $111,000 may be applied to the purchase of land as follows: Aisne-Marne, $20,000; Suresnes, $9,000; Somme, $11,000; Brookwood, $31,000; St. Mihiel, $15,000; Oise-Aisne, $20,000; Flanders Field, $5,000; total, $111,000.

So it will be seen that there is authority for the purchase of land and the money has been paid out for that purpose.

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. Mr. Chairman, my impression—and I feel confident it is correct—is that the appropriation referred to by the gentleman from Illinois was to purchase additional land. The land which originally constituted these cemeteries was provided by the French Government through some arrangement between our military authorities and theirs, by which they ceded to us the necessary land for our cemeteries. The appropriations were to round out and extend the area of the original cemetery tracts.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. The Chair has examined the amendment submitted by the gentleman from Maryland and finds it is a limitation. There is an appropriation here in this item of $548,550 for erecting headstones upon the graves of American soldiers in Europe. Now, this amendment limits the expenditure of this appropriation to headstones of a certain general description, and consequently it is only a limitation upon the appropriation, provided if with the limitation added it does not alter existing law. The national cemetery act is not the act under which cemeteries in Europe are established, and its provisions do not pertain to these cemeteries, but the act which is chapter 120, second session, Sixty-seventh Congress, the act read by the chairman of the committee, is the act that applies. That act contains no provision whatsoever on the character of headstones or markers to be used. Consequently the point of order is overruled.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I hope the committee will not adopt the amendment. In the first place, I think it is an administrative proposition, the question of whether the headstones shall be of one type or another, and this committee ought not to be involved in the quarrel between the Quartermaster's Department and the American Monument Commission with reference to this matter. It is purely administrative, and I hope the committee will join with our committee in voting down the amendment.

Mr. HILL of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, may I have a moment, since the amendment has been held in order? Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I can well appreciate the attitude of the chairman of this committee. It is entirely proper that there should not be legislation on an appropriation bill, and the Appropriation Committee is a committee which should not permit legislation on such bills. But this amendment is in order, and it has been ruled in order. It is a perfectly definite limitation, and I want to explain just this one thing to the committee:

You created the American Battle Monuments Commission. This action of the War Department board was taken before that commission began to function and before General Pershing went to France on the inspection of the cemeteries which he has been making. Now, the Battle Monuments Commission has unanimously agreed. With the exception of one lady, a gold-star mother, they are all service men on that commission—your representative on the commission, the representative of the Senate on the commission. Its members are all men who were in France, and they were all unanimously agreed that what is expressed in the Andrew bill, on which this amendment is based——

Mr. MADDEN. Why does not the gentleman get the Andrew bill passed and let us put an appropriation in, but not until the Andrew bill or some other bill is passed? That will fix a definite policy, and to that there can be no serious objection.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL of Maryland. I will.

Mr. GRIFFIN. May I ask whether the gentleman's amendment will entail an increase in the appropriation?

Mr. HILL of Maryland. My impression is that the amendment will make the appropriation much less, because I doubt if the American Battle Monuments Commission will be in favor of making marble monuments in the United States and incurring all the extra expense of transporting them over there. It will, I expect, be in favor of getting the monuments at much less cost in France when the time comes, if they are to be of stone. If they are to be bronze, the cost will be less here and the transportation less, if they are made here. I hope the committee will vote for this amendment.

Mr. GRIFFIN. The gentleman from Illinois says that the monument proposed to be put up or set up would cost $17. Has the gentleman accurate information as to what it will cost under the proposed amendment?

Mr. MADDEN. Seventeen dollars, transported from the United States and erected in France.

Mr. GRIFFIN. I heard that.

Mr. HILL of Maryland. The chairman of the committee very clearly brought that out. Under the present plan it will cost about $9.04 in the United States; $17.90 after transportation of the headstones to France and set up in France. Now, the American Battle Monuments Commission has informally made a plan of a cross or a star either of bronze or stone. The bronze will cost $6.30 in the United States. This amendment will make a great reduction in cost of the needed markers or stones in our American cemeteries in France, and will comply with the wishes of the men who served in France and of the mothers and widows of the men who died and are buried in France.

Yesterday before the Military Affairs Committee some of those mothers and widows showed us the photographs of the crosses or stars that now mark the graves of their soldiers, and plead that there should not be substituted for these crosses and stars the usual headstone, which is proposed by the officers who appeared before the Appropriations Committee.

There are very few members of the Committee of the Whole House now present and it is so late in the day that I shall not make a point of order on the absence of a quorum. I hope you will pass this amendment, but if you do not we have placed before the Congress the wishes of the ex-service men and women and of the war widows and mothers, and I feel sure that ultimately, as the chairman of the Appropriations Committee suggests, the views expressed in the resolution of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ANDREW], which I have incorporated in the pending amendment, will prevail.

I would rather see this whole appropriation dropped for the present than have the crosses and the stars replaced with marble slabs. We who saw some of those crosses erected over the fresh graves of men who had just fallen, like the families of those men, have a feeling of sacred reverence for those crosses and stars.

We do not want to see them replaced with marble headstones. We want, in the words of the pending amendment—"that the permanent markers to be placed upon the graves in American military cemeteries overseas shall be of the same general form and design and have the same general effect as the existing wooden markers."

The crosses, "row on row," mean much to the American people. They should be perpetuated. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Maryland.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. HILL of Maryland. I ask for a division.

The committee again divided; and there were—ayes 6, noes 17.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a division.

The CHAIRMAN. The committe just divided.

Mr. GRIFFIN. I ask for tellers.

Mr. MADDEN. I trust the gentleman will not do that. Let us finish this bill. We have worked night and day trying to get this bill out of the way. I do not very often ask anybody with reference to such a matter, but there is nothing to be gained.

Mr. GRIFFIN. There are some important——

Mr. MADDEN. There is nothing in the bill except judgments and audited claims and we can finish it. There is nothing of any importance to be considered.

Mr. GRIFFIN. I will withdraw the demand.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

For salaries and expenses, Federal Board for Vocational Education, $293.81.

Mr. HILL of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. BEEDY). The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. HILL] moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. HILL of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on the subject I last discussed.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Maryland?

There was no objection.

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. Mr. Chairman, I make the same request.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For education of natives of Alaska, $19.27.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLANTON. Would it be possible, under the circumstances, for the Clerk to read this bill scientifically?

Mr. MADDEN. It had better be read.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Would it not be better to move to rise?

Mr. BLANTON. If the Clerk could read it scientifically it would be better.

Mr. MADDEN. Let us read on.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I am not objecting.

Mr. BLANTON. I just wanted to know if the Clerk could read it scientifically.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk resumed and concluded the reading of the bill.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to go back to page 22, relating to the Alaskan Railroad.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to return to page 22. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The clerk will report the paragraph referred to.

The Clerk read as follows:

THE ALASKA RAILROAD.

For expenses of maintenance and operation of railroads in the Territory of Alaska (in excess of revenues) during the fiscal year 1924, $245,000.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MADDEN: Page 22, line 4, after the figures "$245,000" insert the following: "Provided, That no part of this sum shall be expended for the construction of hotels."

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. LEHLBACH). The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MADDEN. I have an amendment also to the next paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next paragraph.

The Clerk read as follows:

For expenses of replacements and betterments of roadway and structures of railroads in the Territory of Alaska, and for providing additional equipment for said railroads, $865,000, to remain available until December 31, 1924.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MADDEN: Page 22, lines 5 to 8, inclusive, strike out and insert "For bridge renewals, including filling old trestles, renewal of ballasting, bank widening, riprapping, reconstruction of telegraph lines, and for additional rolling stock, $865,000, to remain available until December 31, 1924."

Mr. MADDEN. This is the program for improving the railroad in Alaska, aggregating $5,250,000, $865,000 of which is carried in this bill. Information came to the committee which led us to believe that it would be better for us to put this restriction on the expenditure than to have it go as it appears in the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BLANTON. Is there any other restriction that the gentleman can think of to put around the other items in the bill, to safeguard them?

Mr. MADDEN. No; but I wish there were.

I wish to say, Mr. Chairman, before we close the consideration of the bill, that I am very much obliged to the Members of the House for the consideration which they have given to the Committee on Appropriations to-day in order to expedite the passage of this bill.

I move, Mr. Chairman, that the committee do now rise and report the bill back to the House with the amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. LEHLBACH, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 7449) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in certain appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1924, and prior fiscal years, to provide supplemental appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1924, and for other purposes, had directed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to, and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and amendments to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put them en gross. The question is on agreeing to the amendments.

The amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill as amended.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. MADDEN, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

LONGFELLOW'S HOME.

Mr. BEEDY. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks I insert an article from the Washington Evening Star respecting Longfellow's birthplace, which is as follows:

SEEK TO PRESERVE LONGFELLOW'S BIRTHPLACE—AUTOGRAPHED ENGRAVINGS TO BE DISTRIBUTED IN EFFORT TO RAISE NEEDED FUNDS—WILL GO TO CAPITALS—PICTURES TO BE PRESENTED WITH NAMES OF ALL SUBSCRIBERS.

In order to provide for the permanent preservation of the birthplace of Henry W. Longfellow, the great American poet, in Portland, Me., The International Longfellow Society is making plans to present the White House, the capital of every State, and the capital of every country in the world with an engraving of the world's best-loved poet. Each engraving was autographed by the artist and poet a few months before his death.

Approved by such men as Theodore Roosevelt and William H. Taft, the aims and ideals of the society are as follows:

"To secure and preserve the birthplace of America's greatest poet, Henry W. Longfellow; to collect and exhibit and preserve printed and other matter and material relating to him; to encourage a world-wide observance of each succeeding anniversary of his birth; to promote the study of his writings and other literature; to honor him and other writers in such ways and by such means as the society may be able."

This endeavor will be accomplished through subscriptions from individuals, colleges, schools, clubs, and other organizations, and these engravings will be distributed when the society has received subscriptions amounting to $500. At that time one of the engravings, appropriately framed, will be presented to the White House as a gift of the subscribers, accompanied by a list of them.

Each contributor will receive an attractive life-membership certificate in the society, free from further fees or dues of any kind.

Following the same method, another of these engravings will be immediately presented to the executive of each country, State, city, institution, or organization from which contributions aggregating $500 are received.

These engravings were published in 1881 and have been held by the publishers for more than 40 years, with the certainty that, being autographed by the poet, they must eventually become of great value. The society now controls all of them and feels that their disposition as now planned will bring joy to millions of lovers of Longfellow.

The Washington office of the society is room 420, Bond Building, and subscriptions should be mailed to that address in care of The International Longfellow Society.
